Simultaneously with Mr. Bache's evening concert the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society were performing Handel's "Israel in Egypt," which was given with the vast forces of this institution, numbering nearly 1200 chorists and instrumentalists. With this gigantic power the noble choruses told with grand effect. The solo singers were Misses Edith Wynne and S. Ferrari, Madame Patey, Mr. V. Rigby, and Mr. K. Gedge. The oratorio was given with the additional accompaniments of Mr. G. A. Macfarren. Mr. Barnby conducted. A special feature in the performance was the transference of the duet for two basses, "The Lord is a man of war," to the male chorists, by whom it was sung with such effect that it had to be repeated.

The Crystal Palace Concert of Saturday included the performance of two works for the first time there—Beethoven's cantata, "The Praise of Music," and Sir Sterndale Bennett's new sonata for pianoforte solo, entitled "The Maid of Orleans." The former was originally produced in haste (under the title of "Der Glorreiche Augenblick") for performance on the occasion of the meeting of the allied Sovereigns at Vienna in 1814. After Beethoven's death it was adapted to another text and brought out as "Preis der Tonkunst." Although far from being one of his best works, there is much that is beautiful, with frequent indications of power and genius, in the cantata. The soprano recitative, "Whence art thou?" and the air, "Join with me" (the latter with incidental choral passages) were very effectively given, on Saturday, by Madame Otto-Alvsleben; an important accessory in the accompaniment to the air being the violin obbligato, which was skilfully played by Herr Straus. Although far simpler in style, quite as beautiful is the cavatina, "Never more shall sorrow," with its choral repetition. This solo was well sung by Miss Spiller. Among other effective pieces were the quartet, "Be evermore united," and the grand final chorus, "Then sing me." The incidental tenor and bass solos of the cantata were sung by Mr. V. Rigby and Mr. G. Fox, and the work throughout was generally well rendered in its orchestral and vocal features, the chorists having been the members of the Crystal Palace choir. An earlier hearing (in London) of the sonata referred to was its performance by Dr. von Bülow at his recital of last Wednesday fortnight, as previously noticed. Its rendering and execution by Mr. Franklin Taylor on Saturday evinced careful preparation and thoughtful study. Another fine solo instrumental performance was that of Herr Straus in portions of Spohr's sixth violin concerto. Miscellaneous vocal pieces by Madame Alvsleben, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. Fox, and the overture to "Der Freischütz," completed an interesting programme. The concert of to-day (Saturday) is to be commemorative of the death of Mozart, this being the anniversary of the event.

Dr. Hans von Bülow's third recital took place on Wednesday, when his programme included the great solo sonata of Beethoven, op. 106, in B flat—that Leviathan work which is the despair of most pianists.

At this week's Monday Popular Concert (as at the previous Saturday afternoon performance) Dr. Hans von Bülow was again the pianist; his performances on Monday having been in Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's new solo sonata, "The Maid of Orleans;" Rubinstein's sonata for piano and violoncello (op. 18), with Signor Piatti, and Beethoven's trio in D (from op. 70), with the same violoncellist and Madame Norman-Néruda, who was also the leading violinist in the string quartet (Haydn's in G, from op. 64). Mr. Santley was the vocalist, and Sir J. Benedict the accompanist.

Mr. Henry Holmes's Musical Evenings, at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, have maintained their interest throughout the four concerts which have already taken place. At that of last Wednesday the programme included Mendelssohn's string quartet in E flat (from op. 44), Mozart's quintet in C, and Schubert's duo in A for piano and violin. But one more concert remains, the date of which is Dec. 17.

M. Rivière's Promenade Concerts at Covent-Garden Theatre have come to a close. They commenced on Aug. 16, and have been maintained with great spirit and consequent success—their career being necessarily stopped on account of the preparations for the forthcoming Christmas pantomime. For this (Saturday), the final night, many special attractions are promised, the occasion being that of M. Rivière's benefit.

The report and accounts of the recent Bristol Musical Festival have just been presented at a meeting of guarantors. The sale of tickets realised over £5700, and the expenditure left a balance (including 100 gs. presented by Mr. Sims Reeves, because of his indisposition and consequent inability to sing at some of the concerts) of £270. It was agreed to keep the odd pounds in hand, and give £100 each to the hospital and infirmary.

At a recent meeting of the Glasgow Festival Committee it was reported that the result showed a balance of over £1600 to be handed over to the Glasgow Western Infirmary, for whose benefit the festival was held. The committee were re-appointed to make arrangements for the next festival, and for establishing a resident orchestra in Glasgow.

Sir Robert P. Stewart, Mus. Doc., Trinity College, Dublin, has been elected musical director of the Philharmonic Society in that city, vice Mr. H. Bussell, resigned.

From Nice we hear of the success, on the Italian Opera stage there, of a young English tenor singer who has adopted the name of Ugo Talbo, and was very favourably received in his recent début as the Duke in "Rigoletto."

One of Richard Wagner's favourite projects is about to be realised. An opera-school for the cultivation and training of stage-singers is to be associated with the famous theatre at Bayreuth, the cost being defrayed out of the Royal exchequer and the management intrusted to the Intendance of Royal Stages. The project has already been approved by the King of Bavaria.

THEATRES.

STRAND.

The example of reviving, in an abridged version, our old comedies, is an expedient of such obvious advantage to managers that, if successful in one or two instances, it is sure to be followed. It has been already tried with benefit at the Strand Theatre; and therefore we have no reason to be surprised that Mrs. Cowley's comedy of "The Belle's Stratagem" was chosen for Miss Ada Swanborough's benefit, and repeated on Saturday. It is likely to form a feature in the bills for some time. Miss Swanborough, as Letitia Hardy, has many qualifications for the character. Her assumption of the hoyden, in order to awaken some feeling in her future husband, though it be of disgust, lay clearly within her means, and the manner in which she sustained the temporary rôle was full of humour and tact. Her appearance at the masquerade where, as the fine lady, she succeeds in obtaining her husband's admiration, was thoroughly satisfactory. In the abridgment of the play some incidents are necessarily dropped which served to render the plot less improbable, and for the same reason there is a want of light and shade in the disposition of the events and persons. The play, as now performed, is adequately cast. Mr. W. H. Terriss, as Doricourt, the travelled gallant, looked like a gentleman and scholar who had made himself familiar with the free manners of the Continent; nor did he overstep the mark, except perhaps in the simulated mad scene. His extravagance was, however, probably intentional, and adapted to show that he was not really mad, according to the stage-directions embodied in the text. Sir George Touchwood was significantly rendered by Mr. F. Roland; and Mr. Hardy, in the hands of Mr. C. H. Stephenson, found an able representative. Flutter is an important character, and was gaily supported by Mr. Harry Cox. One of the best-sustained characters was the Widow Rackett, and the credit of this is due to Miss S. Turner. Miss Nelly Bromley looked charming as Lady Francis Touchwood. The costumes selected were costly and graceful; but the scenery, though appropriate, is not new.

ROYALTY.

From Mr. James Albery we always expect not only something new, but something singular and startling. On Saturday we had both, in the shape of a comedy called "Married," the joint production, we believe, of Mr. Albery and the late Mr. T. W. Robertson. It is very difficult to trace the fable of the new drama, which turns upon a sham marriage of a very improbable type, in which a Scotch pastor is deceived by two young ladies, Miss Anne Day (Miss Henrietta Hodson) and Miss Emily Spottiswoode (Miss Anne Temple). The latter lady, disguised in her brother's clothes, goes through the ceremony in his name with the former, thus leading to perplexities which can only be got rid of by the burning down of the church and the destruction of the registry. Robert Spottiswoode, the brother, is supposed to be at the time in Australia; nevertheless, M'Still (Mr. J. Clarke), the butler of the establishment, is induced by the merry young ladies to believe that he has actually married Miss Anne. When Robert appears on the scene, the mystified M'Still further mystifies the young man, who believes that his innuendoes apply to a Miss Lucy Sandys (Miss Augusta Wilton), with whom he is himself in love, and who is, besides, an heiress and the ward of "Aunt Anne," as Miss Day is always called. As to Miss Day herself, the father of Miss Spottiswoode, Sir Hume Spottiswoode (Mr. W. H. Stephens), has formed a matrimonial design upon her fortune; but his intentions are frustrated by the arrival of Ancrum, who informs him of his son's marriage already with the lady. Further complications ensue. Report says that the ship in which Robert sailed has been lost, and that every soul perished. We are next made acquainted with Lucy Sandys, travelling on the Continent with Aunt Anne and M'Still, followed by Robert Spottiswoode and one Pomfret Penn (Mr. E. T. Webber), who has determined to secure the supposed widow. The latter come up with the ladies, and Robert, on announcing himself, is treated as an impostor by Aunt Anne, who appeals to Penn for protection, and thus unconsciously flattens his hopes. In this state of things a junior partner of the firm of Scroggy and Pipstick is introduced, who is determined to arrest the supposed impersonator of Robert; but, before his design can be accomplished, Robert and his father have interviewed each other. The plot now hastens to a conclusion. Robert, armed with the certificate of marriage, confronts Aunt Anne; and, after a deal of farcical business, all parties become aware of their proper relationships, Miss Day pairing off with the convenient Pomfret Penn. Thus the chapter of queer accidents comes to an end. Throughout it was admirably played, and ought, we think, to command success, notwithstanding some eccentricities in the conduct of the piece—which, perhaps, are calculated rather to puzzle than to please a commonplace audience.

OLYMPIC.

Mr. J. Mortimer has been ambitious of placing on the English stage a fair version of Beaumarchais's famous comedy, which conducted in so marked a degree to the French Revolution, under the title of "The School for Intrigue." It is rendered in four acts, and exceedingly well placed on the boards, with some charming new scenery; nevertheless, the audience of Monday did not seem to understand the importance of the appeal. Such a work ought not to be hastily reviewed. We therefore take time for its full consideration.

PRINCESS'S.

We regret to find that Mrs. Rousby has been seriously indisposed and unable to continue the performance of the interesting part of the patient Griselda; but her place has been satisfactorily supplied by Miss Marie Henderson, who, though suddenly called upon to assume the part, has proved herself equal to the occasion.

After a brief visit to America, Mark Twain has returned to London, and again taken up his quarters at the Hanover-square Rooms with a series of repetitions of his successful lecture on "Our Fellow-Savages of the Sandwich Islands."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD THOMAS CECIL.

Lord Thomas Cecil, who died, on the 29th ult., at 6, Granville-place, was the second son of Henry, first Marquis of Exeter, by Sarah, his second wife, daughter of Thomas Hoggin, Esq., of Bolas, in the county of Salop, and was thus brother to Brownlow, second Marquis of Exeter, father of the present Marquis, A.D.C. to the Queen. Lord Thomas was born Jan. 1, 1797, and entered the Army in 1816. He became Lieutenant-Colonel in the Coldstream Guards, attained the rank of Colonel in the Army in 1846, and subsequently retired. He married, Aug. 8, 1838, Lady Sophia Lennox, daughter of Charles, fourth Duke of Richmond, K.G.

SIR H. L. PRESTON, BART.

Sir Henry Lindsay Preston, Bart., of Valleyfield, in the county of Perth, died at Bath on the 25th ult. He was born, Feb. 18, 1789, the second son of Sir Robert Preston, seventh Bart., by Euphemia, his wife, daughter of John Preston, Esq., of Gorton; and was brother to Sir Robert Preston, eighth Baronet, whom he succeeded Oct. 23, 1858. Sir Henry, who was a magistrate for Berwickshire, served formerly in the Royal Navy; he became a Commander in 1830, and Captain on the retired list in 1856. He was never married.

SIR H. J. BROWNRIGG.

Sir Henry John Brownrigg, C.B., died, on the 25th ult., at his residence, 12, Talbot-square, Hyde Park. He was born in 1798, the eldest son of the late General Thomas Brownrigg, by Anne, his wife, daughter of R. Shearman, Esq., and was nephew to General Sir Robert Brownrigg, Bart., G.C.B. Sir Henry was educated at the Military College, Sandhurst, and entered the 95th Regiment in 1815. In 1828 he joined the constabulary, and held the post of Inspector-General of Constabulary in Ireland from 1853 to 1865. He was made a C.B. in 1867, and created a Knight Bachelor in 1859. He married, in 1822, Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Cooke.

THE HON. THE CHAMPION DYMOKE.

The Rev. John Dymoke, of Scrivelsby Court, in the county of Lincoln, the Honourable the Queen's Champion, died at Naples, on the 22nd ult. He was born Oct. 8, 1804, the second son of the Rev. John Dymoke, of Scrivelsby, Prebendary of Lincoln, by Amelia Jane Alice, his wife, daughter of Admiral Elphinstone, of the Russian navy, and represented in the direct male line the ancient house of Dymoke, in which has vested, since the reign of Richard II., the chivalrous office of Champion. When William the Conqueror granted the manor of Scrivelsby to Robert de Marmyon, he affixed a condition that it should be held by grand serjeantry, "to perform the duties of Champion at the King's Coronation;" and thus the peculiar office originated. Eventually a coheir of Philip de Marmyon married Sir Thomas de Ludlow; and their granddaughter and heir, Margaret de Ludlow, becoming possessed of Scrivelsby, carried to her husband, Sir John Dymoke, the Championship and the lands to which it was attached. The Rev. John Dymoke, whose death we record, married, Nov. 22, 1830, Mary Ann, daughter and heir of the Rev. Clement Madeley, D.D., and leaves one son, Henry Lionel. Mr. Dymoke succeeded, April 28, 1865, to the property of his brother, Sir Henry Dymoke, Bart., who performed the duties of Champion at the memorable coronation of King George IV.

At Dundee, on Monday, the foundation-stone of a church, built for the Rev. Mr. Knight by the congregation which has seceded with him from the Free Church of Scotland, was laid by the Provost, in the presence of the two members for the borough and a large number of the leading citizens of Dundee.

At a crowded meeting of the National Agricultural Labourers' Union, held in Leamington on Monday night, Mr. Arch stated the results of his mission to Canada, and strongly advocated the emigration of labourers thither as a means of improving their condition.

We are glad to be informed that the announcement of the death of Mr. Bell, Sheriff of Lanarkshire, which appeared in our last issue, is incorrect; and we are happy to be able to state further that all unpleasant symptoms have disappeared, and that there is good reason to anticipate Mr. Bell's complete recovery.

Mr. Bright has written a letter on the licensing system, in which he states that he does not approve of the magistrates exercising the licensing power, which would be better placed in the hands of town councils, subject to certain limitations. He would have been glad if the management of elementary schools had been placed in the hands of the municipal authorities.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Under the very clever management of Mr. Verrall, the Croydon steeplechases have always proved successful; but the meeting held last week fairly eclipsed all its predecessors, and Croydon, as an "illegitimate" fixture, is now second in interest only to Liverpool. This popularity is, no doubt, partly owing to extraneous causes. The date of the meeting, just at the end of the flat-racing season, is happily chosen; and then the course is within easy reach of town, and, though by no means so difficult as the Liverpool country, the long four miles at Croydon are not altogether such mere racing as has been represented, as Cramoisi and the unlucky Scarrington can amply testify; so that owners of racers and hunters are pretty equally satisfied. As a general rule, the hurdle-races fall to the ex-racers and the steeplechases to the hunters; but on the present occasion the exiles from the flat took more than a fair share of the honours, as they not only carried off all the important hurdle-races, but actually secured the Great Metropolitan itself. St. Aubyn, the winner of the chase, is a very well-bred horse, being an own brother to Mr. Merry's famous racer, St. Mungo; and, though he carried but a light weight and beat the moderate Silvermere by only a head, we should not be surprised if he has a great future before him. At any rate, he seems to be a generous horse and a good stayer, and, what is very important in steeplechasing, eminently teachable, for his victory was attained after only a few months' schooling to his new business. Of those behind St. Aubyn we think Fantôme alone will make anything of a name for himself, as Dora, the favourite, is a mere rat; Silvermere never shows to much advantage, except at Croydon; Congress cannot stay; Master Mowbray is too slow and old; and the remainder, with the possible exception of Phrynie, are very moderate. The chief hurdle-race was won by Dr. Temple, and the very useful Derviche carried off no less than three steeplechases for his owner, Lord Marcus Beresford. It is worth noticing that St. Aubyn could only secure the fourth place in the hurdle-race, from which we may infer that stamina rather than speed is his forte.

We are indebted to the Sportsman for the following list of the principal winning jockeys on the flat during the past season:—

The sign † indicates a dead heat for first place having been run.

The walks over are in each case added to the winning mounts.

It will be seen that Constable heads the list with 109 winning mounts. The struggle between him and Archer was wonderfully close and exciting, and the latter, after heading the poll till within a fortnight of the close of the season, experienced a run of bad luck, and was beaten by two. Singularly enough, in the course of the year Archer's mount was disqualified for two races which he had won; so, but for these mishaps, the crack light-weights, who both bear excellent characters for honesty and general good behaviour, would have made a dead-heat of it, as Fordham and Maidment did in 1871. Fordham, though he only takes third place, carries off the honours of the year. His riding has been simply superb, and he has secured two out of every five races in which he has taken part, a truly remarkable average; indeed, in spite of his weight, he would probably have been first once more had he not given up a great many mounts that he might have had. Cannon, the most elegant horseman of the day, fully sustains his reputation with eighty-two victories; and Wyatt, Jeffery, Newhouse, both the Osbornes, Mordan, and Maidment, have all done well.

The Newmarket Champion Coursing Meeting, which occupied five days of last week, must be pronounced an unqualified success. The weather was beautiful, and hares very plentiful and strong; indeed, in many cases the trials were far more severe than owners cared about, as several dogs were run to a complete standstill. Mr. S. C. Lister visited Newmarket for the first time with the most satisfactory results, as he secured the Newmarket Champion Stakes with Lizard, by Cock Robin—Caitness, and divided the All-Aged Stakes, with Lombard, by Telegram—Little Fury, after the dog had run two undecided courses with Friendship, by Breadalbane—Oronoko. Lizard is a wonderfully smart puppy, and beat Pall-Mall, by Blairgowrie—Paragon, in the final course with great ease. He will probably represent his owner in the Waterloo Cup, and the older dogs will have to look to their laurels. The All-Aged Stakes contained the names of several well-known dogs. Babetey, by Cashier—Pab-at-the-Bowster, and Alice Walker were put out in the first round, though they afterwards won the Cheveley Bottisham Stakes respectively. Cornelian was drawn in the first round after an undecided; and her own sister, Amethyst, was beaten by Friendship, in the first ties, after an unlucky trial. Madeline could only win a single course, and Falkirk had such a heart-breaking trial in the first round that his defeat on the second day was a foregone conclusion. Mr. Warwick never gave more satisfaction as a judge; but Metcalf's slipping was scarcely all that could be desired, as he is getting a little too old for such a heavy week's work.

On Monday last, at his own billiard-rooms in Regent-street, W. Cook far exceeded all his previous great achievements with the cue. He was playing an exhibition match of 1000 up with Joseph Bennett, who had scored 386 against the champion's 152. The latter then commenced his monster break, and, after making 62 by all-round play, he scored 263 spot-hazards in succession; then, losing position, he cannoned twice to regain it, and made 19 more "spots," finally failing at a cannon, and having achieved the marvellous break of 936. This wonderful performance gives additional interest to Cook's great billiard tournament at the Guildhall Tavern, which commences on Monday next, and will continue throughout the week. Sixteen of our best professionals have been handicapped, and those who wish to compare the styles of the various great cueists of the day should not miss such an unusual opportunity.

THE GOLD COAST AND ASHANTEE WAR

THE CASTLE OF ELMINA.

VIEW FROM GOVERNMENT HOUSE, CAPE COAST CASTLE.

We observed, in describing the manners and customs of the Ashantee nation, that nothing is so revolting in the character of the West African negro, when left in his native condition of a heathen savage, as the practice of offering wholesale human sacrifices to the hideous gods of his idolatry, or in funeral ceremonies to honour the ghosts of persons of rank lately deceased. Both in the kingdom of Ashantee and in that of Dahomey, where the horrible institution is equally cherished by the Sovereign, the priesthood, the Caboceers or nobles, and the oppressed and brutalised people, a large number of lives, mostly those of prisoners and slaves, are yearly immolated to this dreadful custom. They are led forth in procession through the streets of the town, sometimes in the presence of the King, a Prince, or a Grand Caboceer. Two knives are thrust through the two cheeks of every victim, to prevent his speaking while exposed to public view. Death is inflicted by one stroke of a long and heavy knife behind the neck, severing the head from the body. The head is preserved to ornament the walls of the Royal palace; but the body is cast into a pond or river to feed the fishes, or is left to feed the panthers and vultures in the thicket which grows near the city of Coomassie. This procedure belongs to the routine of an important funeral as much as the interment of gold to a certain value, and of costly wearing apparel, in the grave of the deceased; for it is supposed that the departed soul will require a number of servants or companions to attend him, as well as clothes and money, in the other world.

A large number of public executioners are constantly employed; their office is held in honour, and the chief of them bear gold-hilted swords or knives, walking in the King's train; they also carry the death-stool and the death-drum, hung with human bones and clotted with blood, which are not less admired. Mr. Freeman, while at Coomassie in 1839, was repeatedly shocked by the sight of unburied corpses lying about the streets, and in the principal market-place smelt the horrid stench from a dell close by, full of bushes and tall grass, into which they were thrown and left there. Mr. Bowdich saw and describes the funeral of Quatchi Quoffi's mother, when young girls were slaughtered at the house-door, while the old woman's body was dressed in silk and gold, and laid in state upon her bed. Then came a hundred women, their faces, arms, and breasts daubed with red paint, dancing and howling past; then, with a terrific din of horns, drums, and gunshots, mingled with yells and groans of the mob, the chosen victims, thirteen in number, fantastic in attire, were led on to their place of execution. The King arrived, followed by Quatchi Quoffi and Odumata, each in a glittering dress, borne in a hammock, under a gorgeous umbrella, amidst the shouts of his followers. A half-circle, formed of the men and women of highest rank and fashion in Coomassie, occupied one side of the market-place. The nobles and chiefs, one after another, ran leaping wildly round, firing their muskets and brandishing flags or spears. They drank huge bowls of palm wine, and looked on in their turn while the ladies, elegantly dressed in yellow silk, performed a graceful dance. Then beat the drums, and the victims were led in by the executioners, whose black shaggy vests and caps gave them the look of bears. One after another the poor creatures were dispatched, their right hands being first lopped off, and their heads then severed from the body. A sort of carnival, with drinking, singing, dancing, gun-firing, and other noises, was kept up several days. This was but a small affair. When the King's mother died, he devoted to her obsequies as many as 3000 lives of his war-captives and domestic slaves.

The great yearly festivals of Ashantee, such as the Yam Custom, early in the month of September, and the Adai, which takes place in October, present an amazing spectacle. The capital city, when Mr. Bowdich was there at the Yam Custom, was thronged by an immense multitude from all parts of the country. The King received his numerous caboceers and captains in a large open place. The parade of golden stools and staves, gorgeous umbrellas or canopies, and rich dresses, with gold-handled swords, ponderous jewels of gold, horned helmets, and waving feathers or elephants' tails, must have exceeded the most prodigal inventions of sham splendour on a theatrical stage in Europe. All the heads of all the Kings and Caboceers who had been conquered, from Sai Tootoo to the present reign, with those of the chiefs who had been executed for subsequent revolts, were displayed by two parties of executioners, each upwards of a hundred, who passed in an impassioned dance, some with the most irresistible grimace, some with the most frightful gestures. They clashed their knives on the skulls, in which sprigs of thyme were inserted to keep the spirits from troubling the King. After saluting one by one the assembled magnates under their stately umbrellas, these ministers of Ashantee Royalty withdrew. Each caboceer moved up in turn and presented himself to the King; their bands of music sounded as they marched by. Drinking and firing muskets went on all night. "Next morning," says Mr. Bowdich, "the King ordered a large quantity of rum to be poured into brass pans, in various parts of the town. The crowd pressed around, drinking like hogs. Freeman and slaves, women and children, striking, kicking, and trampling each other under foot, pushed head foremost into the pans, spilling much more than they drank. In less than an hour, except the principal men, not a sober person was to be seen." The same author tells us that about a hundred persons—mostly culprits reserved—are generally sacrificed in the town at this Custom. Several slaves were also sacrificed at Bantama, the sacred suburb of Coomassie, where are the temples and tombs of the Kings.

The reader has probably had quite enough of an Ashantee Grand Custom; we need not quote the description of the Adai. His Majesty's Court and household includes the mystic number of 3333 wives, most of whom he has never seen, and who are sometimes given away by him to favoured or deserving men. The wives go out with an escort, but every man who meets them is obliged, on pain of death, to turn aside or cover his eyes. Mr. Freeman and Mr. Brooking, the Wesleyan missionaries, were privileged, however, in 1842, to see a troop of these ladies in the palace, and to see the King dance with them and his little boys. Among his domestic servants were a clever buffoon or jester, a class of personal attendants called Ocras, a number of differently coloured natives kept for show, and a gang of small boys to carry the fetish bow and arrows, who were licensed plunderers, daily robbing for sport the market-stalls and houses of the city. The furniture and utensils of the King's house, imported from Europe, were kept with extreme care; but very large quantities of provisions were daily consumed. The gold buried with the dead kings in the fetish-house or temple at Bantama is a sacred deposit, which can only be used in case of extreme national distress, to redeem the capital from the hands of an enemy, and the King must never see it.

The civil, judicial, and diplomatic business of the kingdom is administered by the King's orders through the agency of a committee of lawyers and orators, whom Mr. Bowdich calls "the linguists." Litigation is called "a palaver." The laws for the punishment of crimes and the redress of injuries to private persons or property resemble some of those which prevailed among our Teutonic and Celtic ancestors in Europe. Compensation may be paid in money for killing an inferior in rank, but if a man kills one of his equals he is obliged to expiate the murder by an enforced suicide. If he kills his own wife or child he pays a legal amount to the wife's family; but he may kill his own slaves for nothing. Theft is punished by compelling restitution, with an enormous rate of interest—one third of the value for every forty days, which is also the rate charged against an ordinary debtor; and if a debtor be insolvent the creditor may take any of his family, or even himself, to make them slaves. There are severe laws against adultery, and it is forbidden even to praise the beauty of another man's wife. The wife's property is separate from the husband's. A captain or nobleman alone may sell his wife to another man, and he cannot do so if her family are able and willing to redeem her by repayment of the price which he paid them for his marriage: this it is their right to do at any time in case of her being ill-treated by him. Slaves, too, have the right, in a like case, of demanding their transfer to another owner, invoking this act by an oath of awful power—the oath "by the death of the King." In all charges of treason the life of the accuser is forfeited by the acquittal of the accused. Gold-dust in weights of different fixed values is the ordinary currency, and much is spilt on the ground in the market-place of Coomassie; but all these droppings are esteemed the King's property, and it is a capital offence to pick up a grain of the glittering metal there.

The city of Coomassie, which may have a population of 70,000 persons, is built upon the side of a rocky hill of ironstone, not very steep, almost surrounded by a marsh, with large ponds and ditches or watercourses, varying from twenty to a hundred yards broad, and from two feet to five feet in depth. The forest or jungle is close to the town on more than one side; on other sides the plain is overgrown with very thick and tall grass, higher than a man's stature. The city forms an oblong, nearly four miles in circuit, without including the sacred suburb of Bantama, or the palatial quarter of Assafoo, each half a mile distant. It is not fortified by walls, except the ground which belongs to the precinct of the King's palace. The streets are regularly laid out, about half a mile long and fifty to a hundred yards wide; there is a great market-place, called Daebrim, and a small market-place, which is named Gwaba. The dell or grave adjacent to the great market, where the dead bodies are thrown, is called Sammonpome, or the habitation of ghosts: it is the foul haunt of beasts and birds of prey. In several of the streets and squares a few trees are planted for shade, and a circular stone platform, raised two steps, affords a place for the King's golden stool when he comes out, with a crowd of courtiers, to drink palm-wine in sight of the people, and to superintend a revel, a dance, a trial, or an execution. The markets are held daily from eight in the morning till sunset, under the range of booths formed of a cotton shade upon a square wooden frame; here the rustic cultivators bring for sale their yams, plantains, corn, rice, and fruit, their beef, mutton, and pork, with venison, and monkeys' flesh; while the artisans of the town produce their manufactured articles, and the Moorish pedlars from the interior of Northern Africa, or the traders who have met European traffic at Elmina and other coast settlements, offer the imported foreign wares in which they deal. It is a brisk and busy scene in time of peace.

We have now described the kingdom and people of Ashantee, with whose monarch, Sai Quoffi Calculli, the British Government is forced to go to war in defence of the British settlements on the Gold Coast, and in due performance of an implied obligation to protect the nations dwelling near the sea-shore. It is desirable here to give some account of the Gold Coast settlements, which have recently been augmented by the addition of those purchased in 1872 from the Dutch Government, and which are placed, collectively, under the official rule of an Administrator residing at Cape Coast Castle, who is subordinate to the Governor-General of the British settlements in West Africa.

The Governor-General resides at Sierra Leone, above a thousand miles to the north-west, at the extremity of the region called Upper Guinea, which has the Ivory Coast and the Grain Coast, or Liberia, between Sierra Leone and the Gold Coast. Still farther north, five hundred miles above Sierra Leone, is the British settlement on the Gambia, with its town of Bathurst, founded in 1816 mainly for the reception of negroes liberated by the coastguard squadron engaged in suppressing the slave trade.

The estuary of the Gambia, in some parts twenty or thirty miles wide, is narrowed at its mouth to one or two miles by St. Mary's Island; the lesser channel on the other side of this island is called Oyster Creek. Upon this island, which is low and marshy and overgrown with rank vegetation, is situated the little town of 5000 inhabitants named Bathurst. Its most important buildings are the fort, the Governor's house, the barracks, the colonial and military hospitals, and a neat market-place, with a zinc domed roof. There is a much more salubrious position on Cape St. Mary, eight miles distant, where the Europeans of the settlement could live with some comfort, but the roadstead there is said to be inconvenient. Another station for a small detachment of troops, on Macarthy's Island, 180 miles up the river, serves to protect such trade as there is, consisting in exports of ground-nuts, hides, ivory, and bees-wax, to the annual value of £150,000. The native population hereabouts are Mandingoes and Jolofs or Wolofs, races which are very superior in character and intelligence to the negroes of Guinea; and the creed of Mohammed is making some progress among them. The total population of Bathurst, British Combo, Burra, and Macarthy's Island is estimated at 14,000, of whom one hundred may be Europeans.

Sierra Leone, the political head-quarters of the British settlements, derives its Portuguese name, "Lion Hill," from the fancied shape of a promontory at the mouth of the river Rokelle, where an anchorage is found in St. George's Bay. The place was first visited, in 1467, by Pedro de Cintra, who gave it the name of Sierra Leone; the natives had called it Romarong. The mountain range is of sandstone mingled with volcanic eruptive formations, attaining the height of 2300 ft.; Mount Wilberforce, rising behind Freetown, is green and pleasant, with several hamlets and villas. This piece of highland, about twenty miles long by twelve broad, is a peninsula, at the back of which are Bunce River and Calmont Creek, almost separating it from the mainland. The estuary, on its north side, is several miles broad; the opposite shore, which lies low, is a native territory called Bullom. The Sierra Leone peninsula was purchased in 1787 by an English society, with the benevolent object of providing for the negroes who had been released from American or West Indian slavery. This experiment was attended with great suffering and loss of life; but it led to the foundation of Freetown, with a fort which was transferred to the British Government in 1807. A large number of the negroes in our North American colonies, who got their freedom by the confiscation of their masters' property in the revolutionary war, were brought to this place. During many years of this century, while the naval forces of our country were actively employed to stop the slave trade, the population of Sierra Leone was constantly recruited by the cargoes of vessels captured in that unlawful and inhuman traffic. The intention of this establishment was highly philanthropic, but a seaport town like this was not the best school for the negroes to learn industry and morality; they should have been placed somewhere to cultivate the soil. In spite of missions and clergy, Sierra Leone has a very bad moral character. Its sanitary infamy, too, has become proverbial; witness the frequent designation, "The White Man's Grave." The population of the town and outlying settlements, including Sherbro, added in 1862, is about 40,000. There is a Governor-in-Chief (Mr. Berkeley), with an Acting Governor (Mr. J. Pope Hennessy), a Colonial Secretary and a Colonial Treasurer, a Chief Justice, and a Bishop. The yearly value of imports or exports is £300,000 to £500,000. Freetown is built in two streets parallel with each other and with the shore, connected by lanes or smaller streets, on a gentle slope, which rises up to Tower Hill, above 300 ft. high; its lower suburbs are Murray Town, Congo Town, and Kroo Town. The harbour is defended by a battery on King Tom's Point and by other fortifications. Fort Falconbridge and Tower Hill barracks are occupied by negro troops. There is a stately cathedral, St. George's Church, a Wesleyan Missionary College, two hospitals, and a gaol. The large warehouses and dwelling-houses of several merchants are conspicuous in the town. Fort Thornton has been converted into Government House. The mixed and motley population is said to consist of nearly two hundred different tribes from various remote parts of West Africa, owning the rule of at least seventeen temporary chiefs, and seldom able to speak each other's language; but the main division is that of the Akus, or Egbas, for one group, and the Iboos, or Aboos, for the other. Descendants of the negroes brought over from America eighty years ago are distinguished as "Nova Scotians," from the place of their last dwelling before they were removed to Sierra Leone. These divisions have made it a more arduous task to reform the social condition of the people. Enough has been said of Sierra Leone; but it is perhaps worthy of mention that this place was visited in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by Sir John Hawkins, the comrade of Sir Francis Drake, and one of the stout English sea-fighters who defeated the Spanish Armada. Hawkins was a slave-trader, and thought no shame of it.

The Gold Coast, of which a general description was given last week, has a sea front of 225 miles from Apollonia to the Volta. Along this piece of the Atlantic shore of Africa, different European nations, the Portuguese, Dutch, Germans (of Brandenburg), Danes, and English, have created twenty-five military and commercial settlements, almost one for every eight or nine miles of land on the coast, while they have gained scarcely any hold on the country behind them. These stations have mostly fallen into a wretched condition of decay, since the slave trade was put down by which they formerly got their occupation. They have latterly all come into the possession of Queen Victoria's Government, and the best course would be to abandon the greater part of them on the conclusion of the present Ashantee war. Their aggregate population, directly under British rule, is about 300,000; the revenue is less than £35,000; the imports £250,000; and the exports £378,000. The whole affair of the Gold Coast, for the sake of which Great Britain has been thrice involved in war of a vexatious and expensive character, is less important to British commercial interests than the single port of Lagos, which exports palm oil and other commodities to the value of nearly £600,000.

The Portuguese, it has been remarked, came to this coast in the fifteenth century. There is a French claim to the honours of prior discovery by a company of Dieppe and Rouen merchants in 1364 and 1382, when it is said they built a factory on the site of Elmina, which was abandoned in 1413, on account of the English invasion of France under our Henry V. The question is doubtful; but Fernando Gomez, of Lisbon, got a charter in 1471 to trade along the coast south of Sierra Leone, and Elmina was founded in 1481, taking its name from the abundance of the precious metal, as "The Mine" of Gold. It was captured by De Ruyter for the Dutch in 1637. The first voyage of Englishmen to the Gold Coast was that of Captain Thomas Wyndham in 1556. In the reign of Charles II., under the auspices of the Duke of York, afterwards James II., and of Prince Rupert, the King's cousin, was incorporated the Royal Company of Adventurers to Africa. They founded James Fort at Accra, and there was fighting between the Dutch and English at that place. There were two other African Companies of English proprietors, who did a great business in the slave trade throughout the eighteenth century. They had a Parliamentary grant of £13,000 to £23,000 a year. The last company became bankrupt in 1821, when all its forts and factories were taken by the Crown, and were put under the Government of Sierra Leone. But in 1827, after Sir Charles Macarthy's disastrous Ashantee War, it was arranged that all except Cape Coast Castle and James Fort, Accra, should be managed by a committee of merchants in London, with pecuniary aid from Government. There was a local Council, presided over by the Governor of Cape Coast Castle, Mr. George Maclean. The Crown resumed its dominion in 1844, and the Gold Coast was governed by Captain Hill and afterwards by Sir W. Winniett. In 1850 the Danish Government sold to the British, for £10,000, its useless old forts of Christiansborg and Frederiksborg, Augustenborg, and Fredensborg, on this coast, with Kongenstein, at the mouth of the Volta, and Prinzenstein, at Quittah. In 1868 an exchange was made with the Dutch, who gave up Cormantine and their part of Accra, receiving Dix Cove, Apollonia, Commenda, and Seconde.

The British Gold Coast settlements were independent of Sierra Leone from 1850 to 1866. Then, upon the recommendation of a Parliamentary Committee, the present system of Government was established. The late Administrator, Colonel Harley, whose functions devolve pro tem. on Sir Garnet Wolesey, was assisted by a Collector of Customs, a Chief Magistrate, and other official colleagues, forming a Legislative Council; and there are military commandants and subordinate officers at the different coast stations.

Cape Coast Castle, the capital of these settlements, has no particular cape, but its name is a corruption of the Portuguese "Cabo Corso," which meant "Cape Course" or "Cape Cruise," from this point being the usual terminus of ancient voyages. It is well described by Captain Richard Burton, the "F.R.G.S.," in his "Wanderings in West Africa, from Liverpool to Fernando Po" (published by Messrs. Tinsley). He says the distant view of this place, on approaching it by sea, presents "a long, green-grown tongue of reddish land, broken with dwarf cliffs and scours, and lined below with clean sand. Upon the outline appear three projections—a fort at the root, a second about the centre, and a castle with a mass of native huts upon the tip." The first, which lies north-west of the settlement, is Phipps' Tower, or Fort Victoria, a martello thing, so placed that in the hands of an enemy it would command both castle and town. The second, or central, post is Smith's Tower, now Fort William, built by Mr. President Maclean, another martello tower, circular below and square above, mounting twelve guns; it has a lighthouse, 192 ft. above sea-level. The principal castle is upon the tip of the tongue of land, and the native town clusters behind it. The landing-place, which is very bad, as everywhere on this coast, is in a small bay under the north-eastern bastion of the castle, protected by a reef jutting out from a ledge of rocks. From May to August, the ocean rolling in with its full violence, there is a terrific surf; but in December, January, and February, the Harmattan wind blowing off shore, the sea is less feared here. It requires, however, much skill at any time to manage the canoes for landing. A few steps up the steep rock, which is called Tabara, rising 18 ft. above the sea, bring the landed traveller into the gateway of the castle. It is a vast, irregular pile, covering several acres, and in some parts four stories high. Within it is a large triangular space, used for drill, adorned with two mortars and five old Danish brass guns. On the west side is a range of substantial and rather stately buildings, which contain the Council Chamber and the Government offices, with a gallery paved in squares of black and white marble; on another side are barracks, and bastions mounted with guns. The graves of L. E. L. and her husband, Mr. Maclean, are in the drill-yard above mentioned; these are marked by initial letters, and there is a Latin inscription on a white marble tablet on the wall. The castle further includes a court-house for trials, and quarters for the garrison. Passing out of the Spur Battery Gate, across the esplanade, into the town, the stranger finds himself in a broad street, lined with ragged umbrella-trees, a kind of ficus. He notices the Episcopalian church and the Wesleyan meeting-house; but "the sides of the very irregular street are an incongruous mixture of white-washed houses and red-brown clay huts; those of Europeans, some double-storied and of superior dimensions, may show green jalousies; but the earthen walls and dingy roofs of dull grey thatch are like those of the native Africans." Captain Burton, whose account was written ten years ago, denounces the filthy state of the town, the practice of burying the native dead in their houses, and the unwholesome condition of the two graveyards; but we are told that Cape Coast Castle is improved in these respects. He describes the view inland from Fort Victoria, a mile outside the town, overlooking "a wavy mass of little hills, paps, and hummocks, all bushy, some rounded at the summit, others with table-tops; but none with signs of cultivation, being shaggy and with trees between. The only road in sight is the narrow ribbon winding through the valleys in the direction of Coomassie." On the left, or north of the castle, is Fort Macarthy, on the crest of a detached little hill. Below, a mile north-west of the town, is a salt lagoon partly discharging itself into the sea. North-east is Connor Hill, which ought to be the sanitarium of Cape Coast Castle. There are several large and handsome old houses in the town, built by the rich merchants of former days. The native townsfolk of the lower class, who are Fantees, are dressed in a cotton loin-cloth and sheet wrapped about them; they are chocolate-coloured, and not ill-shaped. The women have necklaces, earrings, bracelets, and anklets of metal, and their hair is drawn up to a tall stiff ridge, with a pad or a high comb to support it; behind them is worn a "cankey," or cushion, upon which the baby is sometimes carried. These women do all the hard work, and could do the fighting better than Fantee men, who are the basest cowards upon earth. As a proof that the Gold Coast deserves its name, the sands under the very walls of Cape Coast Castle are frequently washed and sifted for grains of gold.

Accra, seventy miles east of Cape Coast Castle, has an imposing look from a distance, with the Aquapim Hills, 1500 ft. to 2000 ft. high, rising beyond, sixteen or twenty miles inland, and the Ajumanti range in another direction. The neighbouring country is described as very pleasant, open, fertile, and in places well cultivated; Major de Ruvignes, civil commandant, had a plantation there. James Fort is a massive old building, now ruinous, with four sides, each 145 ft. long, besides outer courts and bastions, standing on a rocky point 36 ft. above the sea. Among the large square houses on the shore, bearing witness to the wealth and pomp of a bygone generation of European traders, the most prominent are "The Commodore," which belonged to the Bannerman family, and the "Big House" of the Hansens; but their splendour is tarnished. To the eastward is Fort Crèvecoeur, built by Dutchmen, a white building with a tall turret; and farther along the seaside, two miles from James Town, is the magnificent old Danish castle of Christiansborg, shown in one of our Illustrations. It stands well above the sea upon a rock, forming a square of 190 ft. each side, with a complexity of party-walls, ramparts, bastions, and outworks, all of solid stone masonry. The Portuguese first erected a fort here, which passed into other hands, and to the Danes in 1694, the date inscribed on the walls of the building. A few miles eastward, in a park-like undulating country of grass and clumps of trees, are the famous Fetish village of Labaddi and Tassy or Tesi, where stood the fort of Augustenborg, till it was destroyed by an earthquake. Frederiksborg, in the same neighbourhood, is likewise demolished. Immediately below Accra the ground rises rapidly, and is open and free from the possibility of ambuscade. More than twenty miles inland there are coffee plantations, originally established by the Danes, and it was on the open and upland plateau of Dodowah, twenty-four miles inland and north-east of Accra, that the British troops, consisting almost wholly of coloured men, with native allies, engaged the Ashantees in 1827 and gained over them a signal victory. To the westward of this plateau, a practicable track leads into the interior, through one of the valleys cutting the Bobro or Akropong range of hills, and still traversing the open and upland country, goes north-north-west to Coomassie, through the countries of the Aquapims and Akims, who are more courageous and trustworthy than the low-country Fantees behind Cape Coast Castle.

Elmina, the capital of the old Dutch settlements, is a town of 15,000 people, situated on the coast, nine miles west of Cape Coast Castle and at the mouth of the little river Beyah. The lower fort, which is called Fort St. George, stands on a black rock a little above the water, at the easternmost point of a peninsula formed by this river and by the open sea. This fort has double walls and long batteries, with rectangular towers instead of bastions, and a massive building in the rear. There is another fort, that of St. Jago, on a hill 100 ft. high, commanding the town; it is also called the Konraadsburg, and is an oblong whitewashed building with a central tower, which is said to resemble an hospital with its chapel. The native town is divided into two parts—one on the peninsula, under the guns of the forts, the other extending along the opposite bank of the river with a connecting bridge. The people of the lower-town quarter, under a native chief or king of their own, have been opposed to the new British Government, instead of the Dutch, and have been taking part with the Ashantees against us. After the victories gained by the Ashantee army, in the early part of this year, over the confederated Fantees, Braffoos, Denkiras, Assins, and other tribes, these disaffected inhabitants of Elmina began to help the enemy, by supplying him with ammunition and other stores. The Administrator of Cape Coast Castle, Colonel Harley, therefore resolved to disarm the native town of Elmina, and in case of resistance to destroy it. This order was executed on June 13 by Colonel Festing, of the Royal Marine Artillery, with a detachment of West India negro troops, Royal Marines, sailors, and volunteers, aided by the boats of the naval squadron and the fire of the Castle. We gave some Illustrations of the affair, from sketches by naval officers present, in our publications of July 19 and July 26. The hostile portion of the town of Elmina was entirely destroyed, this being the first action of British forces in the present war. Rockets and shell from the boats and fort were poured on the thatched roofs of the native houses, while a party of sailors and marines, landing on the windward side of the town, set fire to it in many places. Some hundreds of the Elmina men, or their friends from the up country, made a stand against our troops, but were quickly repelled with severe loss. The commercial part of Elmina was not injured. Two stone piers mark the entrance to the river, which could be entered formerly by schooners; but, a bar having formed at its mouth, only boats can enter it now. The landing place, with a stone embankment, is above the bridge. The main street of the town leads from the landing place to the public park. It is planted with gum-trees, and there are several public buildings and large stores of leading merchants.

With regard to the journey from Cape Coast Castle to Coomassie, we find that the distance is about 170 miles; the roads are very narrow, often only four feet broad, and in many cases worn—by the habit of the natives of keeping in the centre of the path, and the action of the rain—into gullies. The whole country from the coast to the river Prah, which divides the Fantee or the Assin from the Ashantee territory, is covered with a dense forest and a thick undergrowth. The natives are able with difficulty to make their way through the jungle, but Europeans can only pass by the roads. The whole district for thirty miles from the coast is a mangrove swamp, and very unhealthy. At thirty miles' distance the country becomes more undulating. Streams are constantly met with, but, save in the rainy season, they are easily fordable. They almost all run east and west. As a rule, the road does not pass through villages, for the inhabitants, for purposes of concealment, build their houses a short distance off. Of open spaces there are scarcely any, those which exist being either clearings round a village or places where villages have once stood. In the latter case the ground is covered with thick low jungle. On reaching the Prah, which is about ninety miles from Cape Coast Castle, the country is a little more undulating and less wooded. The Prah is during the rains a mighty torrent, but in the dry season can be easily forded.

The river Volta will serve as a most useful means of getting quickly through the unhealthy district which borders the coast. Indeed, it is understood that Captain Glover, with the Houssa force which he has been ordered to raise, will steam up the Volta to a place called Pong, situated about fifty-five miles from its mouth. It is possible, indeed, that he may go still higher, for a steamer has before now penetrated as far as eighty miles from the mouth. As matters stand, however, below Pong is to be the place of disembarkation. From thence, no doubt, Captain Glover will proceed almost due north, probably keeping near the river for the sake of transporting supplies in canoes, till he strikes the road from Nagho to Coomassie. He will then be only seven days distant from Coomassie, which will be due west of him, and will travel on a road described as being better than that from Cape Coast Castle.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1873.

Time, in its unstaying flight, has once more brought us to the frontier of that season which by no small portion of our fellow-men is accepted as the symbol of "Good will to men." Christmas will presently be with us. The signs of its proximity may be everywhere observed. One cannot walk the streets without seeing the avant-couriers of its visit. Most of the preliminaries requisite to the celebration of this festivity are daily coming into sight, in their due order. Necessarily and forcibly they wake up in the mind the associations with which we are wont to hallow the occasion. It is not too soon, therefore, to give utterance to the thoughts and sentiments which it inspires. From the depths of our being—from the inmost recesses of our heart—in entire unison with the sacred facts which the holiday is set apart to commemorate, we breathe forth the customary salutation of the season, "A merry Christmas" to all our readers.

As yet, it is true, we remain ignorant of the conditions under which the commemorative day will dawn upon any one of us. Nor is it necessary to the fullest participation of the spirit of that day that it should be otherwise. There is no state of human life in reference to which the feeling and expression of "goodwill" and fellow-kindliness are out of place, or ill-adapted to exercise a genial, softening, and harmonising influence; and, happily, Christendom has so arranged the observance of this season as to evoke to the widest extent, and to exhibit in the greatest variety, the humaner sentiments and sympathies of our common nature. It is true, because it is difficult, for any man to pass through the Christmas season without becoming more than ordinarily susceptible to impressions powerful, in whatever form they take, to open the springs of the gentler and more loving tendencies of humanity. The very air seems to be full of kindly suggestions. All the sights and sounds which play around us make us more sensible of the ties which link man to man, all over the world, in one common brotherhood. The truths which are flashed upon the mind as the season progresses, the forms of greeting everywhere adopted; the festive preparations that come under our notice day by day, and the arrangements planned and put into practice to once more grouping scattered families into domestic parties, carry home to every bosom a power which revives in them a sense of those affinities which in the heat and dust, the toil and worry of "the battle of life" are too liable to escape nurture or even recognition. Christmas comes, bringing with it "airs from heaven" and, if men will let them fan their hearts, under the resuscitating warmth the better and more disinterested impulses of their nature push themselves to the surface, and, as we may say, exhale their natural fragrance. The temper of society becomes sweetened, more benign, more generous, more considerate of others' wants and wishes, under the almost magical charm of Christmas-tide, and the world derives from it a moral lesson which in the estimation of most people gives to it a special value.

Christmas is a winter holiday, but more frequently than not, we think, has been of late years unaccompanied by wintry weather. We know not whether any great meteorological change has taken place during the last half-century; but we have a shrewd suspicion that such apparent change is for the most part in our imagination. We like to conceive of Christmas under the figure of a hale old man, vigorous of constitution, blithe in temper, robed in furs, crowned with ivy, and carrying in his hand a sceptre wreathed with holly and mistletoe. We enjoy his visit most when snow wraps the surface of the land in glistening purity, and frost binds the roads, and the pools, and every expanse of standing water into iron solidity. When he comes thus the rarer beauties of Nature disclose themselves to our admiring view, and so long as we remain blest with physical health and vigour the very sternness of the outside world serves to compress into deeper intensity the warmth of heart which has been kindled within us by the season. These are external conditions which, albeit they are pinching to poverty and often fatal in their severity to the infirm, stimulate charity to "take her walks abroad," and enhance the pleasure of all her activities. One hardly knows whether to wish for a frosty or an open Christmas. Each has its recommendation to different classes; each has, too, its appropriate grounds for thankfulness. Come in what guise it will, however, Christmas-tide is always welcome.

"Peace on earth." It is no small matter of congratulation that Christmas finds this year all the civilised nations in both hemispheres at peace with each other. England, it is true, has on its hands "a little war" on the Western Coast of Africa, which one can only hope will be speedily brought to a close. Holland, too, has a similar affair on her hands in Sumatra; and Russia has to contend with troubles of a like kind in Central Asia. But, with these comparatively trivial exceptions, the world is at peace, and without any immediate and visible prospect of its being disturbed. On the other hand, however, it is impossible to put altogether out of sight—or if it were possible would it be desirable—that famine threatens to overtake a formidable proportion of our fellow-subjects in Bengal. We have to thank God for "peace;" we are under the most urgent obligations in this latter instance to display "good will." When the occasion for the latter arrives it is not to be doubted that we shall do our duty with eager liberality—not the less eager because preceded by the festivities of Christmas. It was the fashion in days long since gone by—and a very good fashion too—on the occasion of any solemn review of remarkable national experience, overlook. Perhaps, however, we may be permitted to utter the wish that in regard to this matter their experience may fully correspond with the customary form of greeting. May lightness and merriment of heart, hand-in-hand with the sobriety of wisdom, be present to grace every family gathering! May childhood impart something of its elasticity and gaiety to old age, and old age regulate, whilst it shares, the buoyancy and vivacity of youth. May there be the spontaneous and glad some outflow of all those emotions which the season and that which it represents are adapted to stir! May ties that have been loosened be reknit; friends that have been estranged enjoy the luxury of reconciliation; those who have suffered bereavement find solace and support; and such as have been spared that trial of their affections be proportionably grateful! In a word, may Christmas so come and pass as to introduce each and all of our readers to "a Happy New Year!"

It is stated that his successor will be Mr. Frederick Goulburn, C.B., the present Deputy-Chairman, and that post is to be occupied by Lieutenant-Colonel Frederick Romilly, already one of the Commissioners. The seat at the board vacated by Colonel Romilly's promotion will not be filled up.

The revisers of the authorised version of the New Testament met on Tuesday at the Jerusalem Chamber for their thirty-fifth session, and sat seven hours. Kimbolton Castle has been this week the scene of a brilliant gathering to celebrate the nuptials of the Duke of Hamilton and Lady Mary Montagu, eldest daughter of the Duke of Manchester. Rich and rare are the marriage gifts being sent to the bride. Her Majesty's present is a costly Indian shawl; the Emperor of Germany's, an enamelled portrait of himself; and the Empress of Germany's, a gold brooch. The Prince and Princess of Wales give an antique cross in precious stones.

Captain Flood Page was yesterday week elected secretary to the Crystal Palace Company, vice Mr. Grove. There were 260 applicants for the office. The new rooms of the School of Art, Science, and Literature, at the Crystal Palace, were opened in the evening with a soirée and conversation, to which about 600 guests were invited. The whole of the tropical department was divided off and lit up with variegated lamps. The chair was taken by Mr. T. Hughes, M.P. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Sir J. Benedict.

Sir Samuel Baker on Monday evening read, in the theatre of the London University, before the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, the account of his explorations of the Upper Nile. The audience included many chief representatives of the intellect and genius of Great Britain; and the lecturer, whose interesting paper has been delayed by illness, was received with loud and long-continued applause, when introduced to the brilliant company by Sir Bartle Frere. On the conclusion of Sir Samuel's address, the Prince of Wales spoke a few words of welcome and congratulation.

"MY FIRST CHRISTMAS."

See! I am Baby! Here am I!
Now, don't you think I'm going to cry!
No; I as well as you am able
To meet the company at table;
For though, since I was born and nursed,
This merry Christmas is the first,
And scarce three hundred days have shed
Their sunshine on my little head,
And though my loving eyes have seen
A single summer's living green,
Nor yet to me was shown or told
The reign of winter, dark and cold,
And still, by mother's arms caressed,
I drink the fountain of her breast,
As plants on sap, on milk I fare,
A human flower, without a care;
Yet not so rooted in the sod,
But growing freely up for God,
And gaining strength of soul and limb
To work and pray and walk with Him—
If when I learn to judge and will
His grace shall guide my manhood still—
Though I am little, as you see,
The least, the last, a toy of glee,
A plaything merely of your sport,
I am a creature of that sort
For whom, to bring His peace on earth,
This day the Saviour came in birth;—
So let the Baby's presence tell
That Christmas tale of love, as well
As Christmas pleasures at the board,
Or by the fire, a yearly hoard
Of festive friendliness you spend,
And cheerful bid the year to end.
Big folks are wise! yet so it may be,
Not one of you knows more than Baby!

THE RUSSIANS IN CENTRAL ASIA.

We are once more indebted to Mr. MacGahan, who was special correspondent of the New York Herald with the Russian military expedition to Khiva six months ago, for an illustration of the scene on May 24 when General Kauffman and his army came in sight of water, to their great relief, after a long and toilsome march through the desert, where they had suffered and might have perished of thirst. Their course had been from the Russian settlements in Bokhara, east of Khiva. They had been harassed all the way by the skirmishing attacks of Turkoman cavalry, under a brigand chief named Sadik in the service of the Khan of Khiva. The river Amoo Darya, or Oxus, lay at an uncertain distance before them; it was needful to cross this river, descending its banks, and thence to advance westward on Khiva. Mr. MacGahan writes as follows:—

"When General Kauffman espied the water glistening from afar, he took off his cap and blessed himself, and so did the officers of his staff, while the whole army set up a cheer. They thought it was the river; it was only a lake, but it was water, and that was what they sorely wanted. But, although the soldiers were dying of thirst, their discipline was such that not one of them broke ranks on coming near the river until the Turkoman assailants were finally charged and put to flight by the Russian cavalry, after having first been thrown into a panic by a few shells. They were pursued to the river, where General Kauffman captured eleven boats, in which he afterwards conveyed his troops across the Oxus. This is called the fight of Ooch-oochak, from the mountains of that name.

"Proceeding sixty miles down the right bank, General Kauffman reached, on May 27, a point opposite Sheikh Arik, where the Khivans had built a fort to dispute the passage. They fired at him with pieces of twelve, throwing round shot. On the 29th he sent General Golovachoff, with a battery of artillery, to reduce the fort. This was done by a cannonade of three hours. The Oxus here is about three quarters of a mile broad; the Khivan guns carried easily across the river. Their aim was so correct that the balls fell right among the Russians, and, had they been shells, might have done much damage."

Mr. MacGahan arrived in the middle of the fight, having left Fort Perofsky on April 4, with three Tartar guides, to overtake General Kauffman's army. The army had changed its route, and he had wandered a month about the desert, suffering great hardships, in search of Kauffman and the Russians. Coming up here just in time, Mr. MacGahan watched the action from a sandhill more than an hour. He was surprised by the rapidity and accuracy with which the Khivans handled their guns. But the Russians only lost two horses and one piece dismounted, which was soon repaired. General Kauffman instantly commenced the passage of the river, which was accomplished by the captured boats in five days. He then marched upon Khiva, and entered that city on June 10.

We have given illustrations both of the Russian army crossing the Oxus and of its entrance into Khiva. Mr. MacGahan speaks in the highest terms of the cheerful courage, the discipline and patient fortitude of the Russian soldiers, who bore extreme fatigue with no better food, often for days together, than the hardest black bread and a little tea. We are much pleased to learn that Mr. MacGahan is preparing a book in which he will relate all the incidents of this remarkable campaign, and his personal experiences in Central Asia.

Bazaine rose and solemnly swore that he never betrayed France. He was, however, condemned to death, with military degradation.

THE RUSSIAN EXPEDITION TO KHIVA: FIRST NIGHT OF THE CROSSING OF THE GREAT CHIRCHIK. THE FIRST

"THE TIRED ATTENDANT," BY F. HUARD.
IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

FINE ARTS.

THE OLD WATER-COLOUR SOCIETY.

The present exhibition of studies and sketches maintain the usual average of respectable skill within the generally limited qualifications and aims of water-colour painters. The absence of Messrs. Carl Haag, Topham, Palmer, Holman Hunt, Boyce, and Lundgren must, however, be felt. Other well-known names, such as Alma Tadema and G. A. Fripp, are but sparingly represented. Nor is the society obviously fortunate in some of its new associates. Mr. H. Clarence Waite, for instance, seems to have suddenly fossilised in a positive and painty mannerism which is alike removed from imaginative and realistic art. Mr. A. Goodwin's Venetian sketches on grey paper have an air of refined taste which is due as much to their negative lightness as to their appreciable soundness. In Mr. Marshall's "Negotiation" (157), a Dante-like figure in a romantic dell, and "Sportsman" (250); and in Mr. North's "Acorn Catkins" (158) and "Trout Stream and Flowers," some nice feeling for colour and sentiment is marred by the discordant use of opaque and transparent pigments noticeable in our most recent school of water-colour painting, whilst, in the latter, details are isolated in a manner which betrays imperfect grasp of the subject as a whole. Mr. Hale's sketches are broad and luminous in a quiet way, but there is little promise of further achievement, and Mr. Brierly seems to concern himself more with nautical and marine facts than with pictorial requirements—his most effective study is "Running the Blockade" (65), a ship chased by moonlight. Mr. B. Bradley's weak and monotonous "Milking Goats, West of Ireland" (245), likewise by no means redeems the promise of early works. Several sketches and studies in Venice, Verona, Florence, and Nuremberg, with delicate, but varied, harmonies of colour, show that the society has sustained a decided loss by the death of the late Mr. Deane. An element of novel interest is, however, furnished in the productions of the newly-elected honorary members, Mr. Prescott Hewitt, the eminent surgeon, and Mr. John Ruskin, the former of whom contributed two views in Wales and Sutherlandshire, which, by virtue of their mellow breadth of atmospheric keeping, are quite worthy of a good place here; and the latter two "studies of the colours of marble" in the base of the Church of St. Anastasia at Verona, and in the apse of the Duomo of Pisa. We doubt not that these studies by Mr. Ruskin will be regarded by professional artists as finical and niggling in handling; as missing the broad relations of light, shade, and half-tint; as greatly exaggerating the local colours of Italian marbles, and thereby ignoring the sobering, harmonising effects not only of light and shade, but of time and climate. Mr. Ruskin's sincerity and earnestness are not to be questioned, but he seems to bring a magnifying lens and a feverish acuteness of perception to the details of his painting, as he does to every successive topic, great or small, of his writing.

Among the more instructive items of the collection are the studies for pictures. Of these the most important is "The Harbour of Refuge" (33), by Mr. F. Walker, which very closely resembles the picture of an almshouse quadrangle exhibited at the Academy two years ago. There is the same potency of colour in the landscape accessories, allowing for the comparative weakness of water colours; the same character in the figures, the same imaginative suggestiveness underlying the whole. The mother and daughter to the left are, however, still more Michael-Angel-like in their proportions; and the strenuous energy of the rower is in still greater contrast to the inertness and lethargy of the poor pensioners round the Founder's statue. By Mr. A. W. Hunt there is also a version of his Academy picture, "A Mountain Joyous with Leaves and Streams" (343), and a study for part of one of his pictures of Northumbrian seascapes, entitled "At the End of the Reef" (263). A sketch of "Loch Alsh" (350), by the same, is beautiful in colour, and as free in execution—which we should hardly expect from this artist—as David Cox. Mr. Marks likewise sends a study for two of the figures in his Academy picture called "What Is It?" (392), besides several decorative designs.

Mr. Pinwell's single unfinished contribution (179), though it may suggest the influence of Mr. Walker, has distinctive merits of exquisite form, sentiment, and grace of expression. The subject is unnamed, but sufficiently explains itself. A young rustic, too handsome and refined for his position, real or assumed, stops in his labour at the plough to listen eagerly to words of love, or betraying love, which a lady, pausing at his side, utters falteringly and anxiously. Maids in attendance wait at a discreet distance. Mr. Birkett Foster, in a "Fruiterer's Shop" (326), very judiciously challenges comparison with Mr. Walker's recent "Fruiterer's Shop"; but in this, in some studies of fish at La William Hunt, and in other subjects new to him, the artist appears to be breaking out of the old ruts of practice; his success will, however, not be great till he can discard the old method of "stippling," which, to those who understand what artistic finish really is, is but mechanical elaboration. Mr. Powell's painting of waves in motion, in several subjects from the Scotch lochs, evince, as heretofore, very keen observation and much care in representation. Mr. S. Read takes a more prominent position than usual with some picturesque "bits" from old Edinburgh; but chiefly with a series of studies from these precipitous cliffs of the west coast of Sutherlandshire with which Mr. Peter Graham, as well as this artist, has lately made us familiar. Most important of these is "Cape Wrath" (128)—a scene so impressive in its wild, savage grandeur that we wonder it has not often been depicted, difficult as is the approach to it. Among several meritorious drawings, chiefly of single female figures, by Mr. J. D. Watson, there are two, "A Stolen Marriage" (29) and "Tis the Old Town" (121), which are distinguished by more invention than the artist commonly cares to bestow.

Several of the longest-established favourites of the gallery put in an appearance with their well-approved subjects or styles, but the pressure on our space this week forbids us to dwell on familiar characteristics. But our readers will know exactly what to expect when we say that Sir John Gilbert has two drawings of martial hosts: the one consisting of mailed cavaliers, the other of a "Saxon swarm;" and, better than either, a group of gambling soldiers of fortune, called "The Hazard of the Die" (262). Mr. Dobson has a life-size female head entitled "St. Thecla" (26). Mr. F. Taylor sends "A Peep into an Otter-Hound's Kennel" (113) and "A Chestnut Hunter" (181). Mr. Dodgeson is represented, as usual, by scraps from the Yorkshire becks and coast, which, if only fragments of landscape, are full of sparkling truth to nature. Mr. Duncan's undemonstrative but sterling merits are displayed in several subjects from the upper Thames. One or two cattle-pieces by Mr. Brittan Willis are at least as pleasing as ever. The fresh charm of direct transcripts from Nature will be found in the landscape contributions by Messrs. A. D. Fripp (which are also distinguished by much refinement of execution), C. Davidson, J. J. Jenkins, A. Glennie, and S. P. Jackson. A Cairene view (192) by Mr. E. A. Goodall, and studies or sketches by Messrs. Nash and Burgess, are worthy of attention among the architectural works not already reviewed. We have omitted from our enumeration of other figure-subjects, though entitled thereto, Mr. R. W. Macbeth's "Preparing a Feast" (210), Mr. W. Goodall's "The Penitent—St. Peter's, Rome" (300), Mr. E. Johnson's "Study of an Old Man" (220), and Mr. Alma-Tadema's "Flute-Player" (366)—a Roman youth serenading a listening girl at twilight.

At the Burlington Fine-Arts Club there is now on view, to members and their friends, the remarkable collection of drawings by David Cox and De Wint belonging to Mr. John Henderson. The drawings by the former are especially fine, and illustrate the principal phases of the artist's power.

A handsome new pulpit has been presented to Peterborough Cathedral for the nave services by the sons of the late Dr. John James, who was a Canon of Peterborough for forty years. The pulpit, which is executed after an admirable design by Mr. E. M. Barry, R.A., is a massive structure of coloured marbles and dark red stone, in a little later style than the Norman architecture of the nave, with statuettes of the four Evangelists in niches at the angles, shafts with carved caps and bases, an Agnus Dei, sacred monogram, and other enrichments.

Two remarkable frescoes of allegorical subjects, with numerous figures the size of life, attributed to Sandro Boticeili, have been discovered in a villa near Florence, on removing whitewash from the walls.

The Roman engraver, Perugini, has just completed the plate after Raphael's "Belle Jardinière," upon which he has been engaged the last ten years.

The residue of her personal estate is to be invested in the purchase of real property, and the testatrix devises the same, together with Pontruffydd Hall, and all her real estate, to her nephew, Captain Arthur Mesham, for life, with remainder to his eldest son.

The will, with two codicils, of James Blyth, late of Hyde Park-gardens, and of Woolhampton House, Berks, was proved, on the 3rd inst., by Alfred Blyth, the brother, Robert Burn, James Pattinson Currie, Frederick Greene, the nephew, and Alexander William Cobham, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £250,000. The testator bequeaths £200 each, free of duty, to the Seamen's Hospital, London; the Royal Burks Hospital, Reading; and the Seamen's Orphan Asylum. There are many other legacies, and large provision is made for testator's younger daughters; the residue of the personalty he leaves to his eldest daughter, Mrs. Isabella Burn, for life, and, at her death, as she shall by deed or will appoint. Testator devises all his estate at Woolhampton and all the rest of his real estate to his said daughter for life, with remainder to her husband, Mr. R. Burn, for life, with remainder to her first son.

The will and codicil of the Hon. Mrs. Charlotte Elizabeth Campbell, of 71, South Audley-street, were proved, on the 24th ult., by Charles Gascoyne (the brother), the acting executor, the personalty being sworn under £40,000. There are various legacies, both pecuniary and specific, to the Earl of Cawdor and other members of her late husband's and her own family; and the testatrix bequeaths the remainder of her personal estate to her brothers and nephews and nieces. All her real estate she gives to her brother Mr. Charles Gascoyne.

The will, with one codicil, of Mr. Thomas Stephens, of North Villa, Regent's Park, and of Lime-street-square, was proved, on the 28th ult., by Mrs. Sarah Wood Stephens (the relict), Samuel Fox Stephens (the brother), Thomas Walls

The testator bequeaths to his wife a pecuniary legacy of £1000, his private residence, and all his household furniture and effects, and a considerable income for life. The residue of his property he gives to his children.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

The seventy-fifth annual show of the Smithfield Club was opened on Monday, at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. The number of entries exceeds that of 1872, then the largest number since the foundation of the club. The catalogue of that year showed a total of 426, while this year there are 486 entries—namely, 249 cattle, 188 sheep, and 49 pigs. The show is throughout of first-rate excellence; and her Majesty has taken the first prizes in the two first classes of Devon—namely, for steers not exceeding two years and a half, and not exceeding three and a quarter. The Prince of Wales took the first prize for Norfolk or Suffolk polled heifers. The cups were won as follow:—

The Champion Plate, value £100, for the best beast in the show—Mr. Walter, M.P., for No. 125, first in class shorthorn heifers, not exceeding four years old.

The £40 Silver Cup, for the best heifer or cow in any of the classes, also to Mr. Walter, for No. 125.

£40 Cup, for the best steer or ox in any of the classes, to Mr. James Bull, for No. 115, the first in class, shorthorn steers or oxen above three years and three months.

Champion Plate, value £50, for the best pen of sheep in the show, to Lord Walsingham, for No. 309, first in the class, fat wether sheep of the Southdown breed, under twenty-three months old.

£20 Cup, to exhibitor of best pen of Leicesters, Cotswolds, Lincoln, Kentish, or other long-woolled breed in any of the classes, to Mr. John Bryon, for No. 275, first in class 62.

£20 Cup, to exhibitor of best pen of one-year-old Southdowns, Hampshire or Wiltshire downs, to Lord Walsingham, for No. 309, the winner of the £50 Champion Plate.

£20 Cup, for the best pen of one-year-old Shropshire, Oxfordshire, crossbred, or any other breed of sheep not specified in prize-list, to Lord Chesham, for No. 273, first in class 52.

Plate, value £20, for best pen of pigs in any of the classes, to Mr. Charles M'Niven, for No. 454, first in class 66.

Cup, value £5, for best single pig in any of the classes, to the exhibitor, for No. 477, first in extra stock pigs.

The annual show of fat stock in Leeds was held on Tuesday, and the number of cattle exhibited was nearly equal to that of former years. In the opinion of local judges, finer animals have not been shown in the northern counties. The highest prize in the exhibition was carried off by Mr. J. Reid, of Aberdeen, with a polled Scotch cow. There was a small show of sheep, the chief exhibitors being Lord Wenlock and the Earl of Zetland. The silver cup was carried off by Mr. Hobson, of Crockley-hill, York.

Mr. Charles Reed, M.P., was on Wednesday unanimously elected Chairman, and Mr. Currie Vice-Chairman, of the London School Board.

The Registrar-General's return shows that the 1484 deaths in London last week included 118 from measles, 23 from scarlet fever, 3 from diphtheria, 41 from whooping-cough, 41 from different forms of fever, 11 from diarrhoea, and not one from smallpox. Diseases of the respiratory organs and phthisis caused 520 of the deaths registered last week, including 218 from bronchitis. To different forms of violence 49 deaths were referred; 44 were the result of negligence or accident, including 7 from fractures and contusions, 5 from burns and scalds, 8 from drowning, 2 from poison, and 17 (all of infants and young children) from suffocation. Four cases of suicide and one of infanticide were registered.

Leicester-square, which, according to the Master of the Rolls, has occasioned more litigation than any other square in Europe, is, by order of the Rolls Court, to be relieved of its hoarding.—The inquiry instituted before Sir Thomas Herry into the behaviour of the police towards Mr. Bell's trial, on Saturday, in the dismissal of the charges against the two accused constables.—When the trial of the Tichborne Claimant for perjury was resumed on Monday, Jean Luis was brought into court in the custody of the Governor of Holloway prison, and evidence was called with a view to showing some of that witness's antecedents. John Woods, an assistant warder at Chatham convict prison, identified Luis as having been under sentence there for a term of seven years' penal servitude. He was discharged on March 25 last on a ticket of leave. Several other of the prison officials having corroborated this statement, Policeman Nichols, from Bristol, deposed that he was present at Cardiff when Luis, under the name of Lundgren, was sentenced to penal servitude for having obtained money by fraud from the Italian Consul. Other evidence bearing upon the credibility of Luis's testimony was forthcoming. On Tuesday sixteen more witnesses swore to Luis's identity with Carl Lundgren. Amongst the testimony adduced was that of Mr. John Lundgren, a native of Finland, who had lived in this country since 1848. He stated that he carried on business on his own account as a shipbroker in Hull, from 1851 to 1857. During a part of that time—viz., from the spring of 1853 to the middle of 1854—he had a Swede named Lundgren in his employment. Although of the same name, he was no relative. Luis was that man. Other evidence showed that from November, 1854, to February, 1855, Luis was a clerk in a shipbroker's office at Cardiff, and that he was employed in this country at the time he has declared that he was at sea in the Osprey and assisted to rescue the shipwrecked crew of the Bella. One of the most striking incidents of the day's proceedings was the appearance of Luis's wife in the witness-box. She made his acquaintance at Christmas, 1854, at Cardiff, and was married to him at Melksham, April 2, 1855. He deserted her some years ago. Some further witnesses were examined on Wednesday, closing the evidence for the Crown. As on the previous day, Dr. Kenealy had an altercation with the Bench, the Lord Chief Justice saying:—"A counsel is not to be allowed to outrage decency and violate all the ordinary rules of propriety in the administration of justice without incurring the censure of the Bench. A Judge is waiting in his duty if he does not interpose when a counsel so acts." On the application of the foreman of the jury, it was arranged that on Friday, the 19th, the Court shall adjourn for the Christmas holidays until Monday morning, the 29th, at half-past ten o'clock, and that during the continuance of the trial the Court meet on Mondays at half-past eleven o'clock.

FRIDA; OR, THE LOVER'S LEAP.

A LEGEND OF THE WEST COUNTRY.

CHAPTER I.

On the very day when Charles I. was crowned with due rejoicings—Candlemas-day, in the year of our Lord 1626—a loyalty, quite as deep and perhaps even more lasting, was having its beer at Ley Manor in the north of Devon. A loyalty not to the King, for the old West country folk knew little and cared less about the house that came over the border; but to a Lord who had won their hearts by dwelling among them, and dealing kindly, and paying his way every Saturday night. When this has been done for three generations general and genial respect may almost be relied upon. The present Baron de Wichehalse was fourth in descent from that Hugh de Wichehalse, the head of an old and wealthy race, who had sacrificed his comfort to his resolve to have a will of his own in matters of religion. That Hugh de Wichehalse, having an eye to this, as well as the other world, contrived to sell his large estates before they were confiscated, and to escape with all the money from very sharp measures then enforced, by order of King Philip II., in the unhappy Low Countries. Landing in England, with all his effects and a score of trusty followers, he bought a fine property, settled, and died, and left a good name behind him. And that good name had been well kept up, and the property had increased and thriven, so that the present lord was loved and admired by all the neighbourhood.

In one thing, however, he had been unlucky, at least in his own opinion. Ten years of married life had not found issue in parental life. All his beautiful rocks and hills, lovely streams and glorious woods, green meadows and golden cornlands, must pass to his nephew and not to his child, because he had not gained one. Being a good man, he did his best to see this thing in its proper light. Children, after all, are a plague, a risk, and a deep anxiety. His nephew was a very worthy boy, and his rights should be respected. Nevertheless, the Baron often longed to supersede them.

Of this there was every prospect now. The lady of the house had intrusted her case to a highly celebrated simple-woman, who, lived among rocks and scanty vegetation at Heddon's Mouth, gathering wisdom from the earth and from the sea tranquillity. De Wichehalse was naturally vexed a little when all this accumulated wisdom culminated in nothing grander than a somewhat undersized, and unhappily female child, one, moreover, whose presence cost him that of his faithful and loving wife. So that the heiress of Ley Manor was greeted, after all, with a very brief and sorry welcome. "Jennyfried," for so they named her, soon began to grow into a fair esteem and good liking. Her father, after a year or two, plucked up his courage and played with her; and the more he played the more pleased he was, both with her and his own kind self. Unhappily, there were at that time no shops in the neighbourhood; unhappily, now there are too many. Nevertheless, upon the whole, she had all the toys that were good for her; and her teeth had a fair chance of fitting themselves for life's chief operation in the absence of sugared allurements.

A brief and meagre account is this of the birth, and growth, and condition of a maiden whose beauty and goodness still linger in the winter tales of many a simple homestead. For, sharing her father's genial nature, she went about among the people in her soft and playful way, knowing all their cares, and gifted with a kindly wonder at them, which is very soothing. All the simple folk expected condescension from her; and she would have let them have it, if she had possessed it.

At last she was come to a time of life when maidens really must begin to consider their responsibilities—a time when it does matter how the dress sits and what it is made of, and whether the hair is well arranged for dancing in the sunshine and for fluttering in the moonlight; also that the eyes convey not from that reguish nook the heart any betrayal of "hide and seek;" neither must the risk of blushing tremble on perpetual blinks; neither must—but, in a word, 'twas the seventeenth year of a maiden's life.

More and more such matters gained on her motherless necessity. Strictly anxious as she was to do the right thing always, she felt more and more upon every occasion (unless it was something particular) that her cousin need not so impress his cousinly salutation.

Albert de Wichehalse (who received that name before it became so inevitable) was that same worthy boy grown up as to whom the Baron had felt compunctions, highly honourable to either party, touching his defenceless; or rather, perhaps, as to interception of his presumptive heirship by the said Albert, or at least by his mother contemplated. And Albert's father had intrusted him to this uncle's special care and love, having comfortably made up his mind, before he left this evil world, that his son would have a good slice of it.

Now, therefore, the Baron's chief desire was to heal all breaches and make things pleasant, and keep all the family property snug by marrying his fair Jennyfried (or "Frida," as she was called at home) to her cousin Albert, now a fine young fellow of five-and-twenty. De Wichehalse was strongly attached to his nephew, and failed to see any good reason why a certain large farm near Martinhoe, quite a huge cantle from the Ley estates, which by a prior devise must fall to Albert upon his own demise, should be allowed to depart in that way from his posthumous control.

However, like most of our fallible race, he went the worst possible way to work in pursuit of his favourite purpose. He threw the young people together daily, and dinned into the ears of each perpetual praise of the other. This seemed to answer well enough in the case of the simple Albert. He could never have too much of his lively cousin's company, neither could he weary of sounding her sweet excellence. But with the young maid it was not so. She liked the good Albert well enough, and never got out of his way at all. Moreover, sometimes his curly hair and bright moustache, when they came too near, would raise not a positive flutter, perhaps, but a sense of some fugitive movement in the unexplored distances of the heart. Still, this might go on for years and nothing more to come of it. Frida loved her father best of all the world, at present.

CHAPTER II.

There happened to be at this time an old fogey—of course it is most distressing to speak of anyone disrespectfully; but when one thinks of the trouble he caused, and not only that, but he was an old fogey, essentially and pre-eminently—and his name was Sir Maunder Meddleby. This worthy Baronet, one of the first of a newly-invented order, came in his sledd stuffed with goose-feathers (because he was too fat to ride, and no wheels were yet known on the hill tracks) to talk about some exchange of land with his old friend, our De Wichehalse. The Baron and the Baronet had been making a happy day of it. Each knew pretty well exactly what his neighbour's little rarities might be hoped to lead to, and each in his mind was pretty sure of having the upper hand of it. Therefore both their hearts were open—business being now dismissed, and dinner over—to one another. They sat in a beautiful place, and drew refreshment of mind through their outward lips by means of long redden tubes with bowls at their ends, and something burning.

Clouds of delicate vapour wandered round and betwixt them and the sea; and each was well content to wonder whether the time need ever come when he must have to think again. Suddenly a light form flitted over the rocks, as the shadows flit; and though Frida ran away for fear of interrupting them, they knew who it was, and both, of course, began to think about her.

The Baron gave a puff of pipe, and left the Baronet to begin. In course of time Sir Maunder spoke, with all that breadth and beauty of the vowels and the other things which a Devonshire man commands, from the Lord Lieutenant downwards.

"If so be that 'ee gooth vor to ax me, ai can zay wan thing, and wan oney."

"What one thing is it, good neighbour? I am well content with her as she is."

"Laikely enough. And 'e wud be zo till 'e zeed a zummut fairer."

"I want to see nothing finer or better than what we have seen now just, Sir."

"There, you be like all varthers, a'most! No zort o' oose to advaize 'un."

"Nay, nay! Far otherwise. I am not by any means of that nature. Sir Maunder Meddleby, I have the honour of craving your opinion."

Sir Maunder Meddleby thought for a while, or at any rate meant to be thinking, ere ever he dared to deliver himself of all his weighty judgment.

"I've a knowed she, my Lard Witcher, ever since her wore that haigh. A purty wanch, and a peart one. But her wanteth the vish of the Court. Never do no good wi'out un, whan a coomth, as her must, to coorting."

This was the very thing De Wichehalse was afraid to hear of. He had lived so mild a life among the folk who loved him that any fear of worry in great places was too much for him. And yet sometimes he could not help a little prick of thought about his duty to his daughter. Hence it came that common sense was driven wild by conscience, as for ever happens with the few who keep that gadfly. Six great horses, who knew no conscience but had more fleshly tormenters, were ordered out, and the journey began, and at last it ended.

Everything in London now was going almost anyhow. Kind and worthy people scarcely knew the way to look at things. They desired to respect the King and all his privilege, and yet they found his mind so wayward that they had no hold of him.

The Court, however, was doing its best, from place to place in its wanderings, to despise the uproar and enjoy itself as it used to do. Bright and beautiful ladies gathered round the King, when the Queen was gone, persuading him and one another that they must have their own way.

Of the lords who helped these ladies to their strong opinions there was none in higher favour with the Queen and the King himself than the young Lord Auberley. His dress was like a sweet enchantment, and his tongue was finer still, and his grace and beauty were as if no earth existed. Frida was a new thing to him, in her pure simplicity. He to her was such a marvel, such a mirror of the skies, as a maid can only dream of in the full moon of St. John.

Little dainty glance, and flushing, and the fear to look too much, and the stealthy joy of feeling that there must be something meant, yet the terror of believing anything in earnest, and the hope that, after all, there may be nought to come of it; and when this hope seems over true, the hollow of the heart behind it, and the longing to be at home with anyone to love oneself—time is wasted in recounting this that always must be.

Enough that Frida loved this gallant from the depths of her pure heart, while he admired and loved her to the best of his ability.

CHAPTER III.

The worthy Baron was not of a versatile complexion. When his mind was quite made up he carried out the whole of it. But he could not now make up his mind upon either of two questions. Of these questions one was this—should he fight for the King or against him, in the struggle now begun? By hereditary instincts he was staunch for liberty, for letting people have their own opinions who could pay for them. And about religious matters and the Royal view of them, he fell under sore misgiving that his grandfather on high would have a bone to pick with him.

His other difficulty was what to say, or rather what to think about Lord Auberley. To his own plain way of judging, and that human instinct which, when highly cultivated, equals that of the weaker dogs, also to his recollection of what used to be expected in the time when he was young, Viscount Auberley did not give perfect satisfaction.

Nevertheless, being governed as strong folk are by the gentle ones, the worthy Baron winked at little things which did not please him, and went so far as to ask that noble spark to flash upon the natives of benighted Devon. Lord Auberley was glad enough to retire for a season, both for other reasons and because he saw that bitter fighting must be soon expected. Hence it happened that the six great Flemish horses were buckled to, early in September of the first year of the civil war, while the King was on his westward march, collecting men and money. The Queen was not expected back from the Continent for another month; there had scarcely been for all the summer even the semblance of a Court, fit to teach a maiden lofty carriage and cold dignity; so that Lord de Wichehalse thought Sir Maunder Meddleby an oaf for sending him to London.

But there was some one who had tasted strong delight and shuddering fear, glowing hopes and chill despair, triumph, shame, and all confusion of the heart and mind and will, such as simple maidens hug into their blushing chastity by the moonlight of first love. Frida de Wichehalse knew for certain, and for ever felt it settled, that in all the world of worlds never had been any body, any mind, or even soul, fit to think of twice when once you had beheld Lord Auberley.

His young Lordship, on the whole, was much of the same opinion. Low fellows must not have the honour to discharge their guns at him. He liked the King, and really meant no harm whatever to his peace of mind concerning his Henrietta; and, if the worst came to the worst, everyone knew that out of France there was no swordsman fit to meet, even with a rapier, the foil of Aubyn Auberley. Neither was it any slur upon his loyalty or courage that he was now going westward from the world of camps and war. It was important to secure the wavering De Wichehalse, the leading man of all the coast, from Minehead down to Hartland; so that, with the full consent of all the King's advisers, Lord Auberley left Court and camp to press his own suit peacefully. What a difference he found it to be here in mid-September, far away from any knowledge of the world and every care; only to behold the manner of the trees disrobing, blushing with a trembling wonder at the freedom of the winds, or in the wealth of deep wood browning into rich defiance; only to observe the colour of the hills, and cliffs, and glens, and the glory of the sea underneath the peace of heaven, when the balanced sun was striking level light all over them! And if this were not enough to make a man contented with his littleness and largeness, then to see the freshened Pleiads, after their long dip of night, over the eastern waters twinkling, glad to see us all once more, and sparkling to be counted.

These things, and a thousand others, which (without a waft of knowledge or of thought on our part) enter into and become our sweetest recollections, for the gay young Lord possessed no charm, nor even interest. "Dull, dull, how dull it is!" was all he thought when he thought at all; and he vexed his host by asking how he could live in such a hole as that. And he would have vexed his young love, too, if young love were not so large of heart, by asking what the foreign tongue was which "her people" tried to speak. "Their native tongue, and mine, my Lord," cried Frida, with the sweetness of her smile less true than usual, because she loved her people and the air of her nativity.

However, take it altogether, this was a golden time for her. Golden trust and reliance are the well-spring of our nature, and that man is the happiest who is cheated every day almost. The pleasure is tenfold as great, in being cheated as to cheat. Therefore Frida was as happy as the day and night are long. Though the trees were striped with autumn, and the green of the fields was waning, and the puce of the heath was faded into dingy cinnamon; though the tint of the rocks was darkened by the nightly rain and damp, and the clear brooks were beginning to be hoarse with shivering floods, and the only flowers left were but widows of the sun, yet she had the sovereign comfort and the cheer of trustful love. Lord Auberley, though he cared nought for the Valley of Rocks, or Watersmeet, for beetling majesty of the cliffs, or mantled curves of Woody Bay, and though he accounted the land a wilderness, and the inhabitants savages, had taken a favourable view of the ample spread of the inland farms, and the loyalty of the tenants, which naturally suggested the raising of the rental. Therefore he grew more attentive to young Mistress Frida; even sitting in shady places, which it made him damp to think of, when he turned his eyes from her. Also he was moved a little by her growing beauty, for now the return to her native hills, the presence of her lover, and the home-made bread and forest mutton, combining with her dainty years, were making her look wonderful. If Aubyn Auberley had not been despoiled of all true manliness, by the petting and the froward wit of many a foreign lady, he might have won the pure salvation of an earnest love. But, when judged by that French standard which was now supreme at Court, this poor Frida was a rustic, only fit to go to school.

There was another fine young fellow who thought wholly otherwise. To him, in his simple power of judging for himself, and seldom budging from that judgment, there was no one fit to dream of in comparison with her. Often, in this state of mind, he longed to come forward and let them know what he thought concerning the whole of it. But Albert could not see his way towards doing any good with it; and, being of a bashful mind, he kept his heart in order.

CHAPTER IV.

The stir of the general rising of the kingdom against the King had not disturbed these places yet beyond what might be borne with. Everybody liked to talk, and everybody else was ready to put in a word or two; broken heads, however, were as yet the only issue. So that when there came great news of a real battle fought, and lost, by Englishmen against Englishmen, the indignation of all the country ran against both parties.

Baron de Wichehalse had been thinking, after his crop of hay was in—for such a faithful hay they have that it will not go from root to rick by less than two months of worrying—from time to time, and even in the middle of his haycocks, this good lord had not been able to perceive his proper course. Arguments there were that sounded quite as if a baby must be perfectly convinced by them; and then there would be quite a different line of reason taken by some one who knew all about it and despised the opposite. So that many of a less decided way of thinking every day embraced whatever had been last confuted.

This most manly view of matters and desire to give fair play was scorned, of course, by the fairer (and unfairer) half of men. Frida counted all as traitors who opposed their liege the King.

"Go forth, my Lord; go forth and fight," she cried to Viscount Auberley, when the doubtful combat of Edgehill was firing new pugnacity; "if I were a man, think you that I would let them do so?"

"Alas! fair mistress, it will take a many men to help it. But, since you bid me thus away—hi! Dixon, get my trunks packed!" And then, of course, her blushing roses faded to a lily white; and then, of course, it was his duty to support her slender form; neither were those dulcet murmurs absent which for ever must be present when the female kind begin to have the best of it.

So they went on once or twice, and would have gone on fifty times if fortune had allowed them thus to hang on one another. All the world was fair around them; and themselves, as fair as any, vouched the whole world to attest their everlasting constancy.

But one soft November evening, when the trees were full of drops, and gentle mists were creeping up the channels of the moorland, and snipes (come home from foreign parts) were cheeping at their borings, and every weary man was gladdened by the glance of a bright wood fire, and smell of what was over it, there happened to come, on a jaded horse, a man, all hat, and cape, and boots, and mud, and sweat, and grumbling. All the people saw at once that it was quite impossible to make at all too much of him, because he must be full of news, which (after victuals) is the greatest need of human nature. So he had his own way as to everything he ordered; and, having ridden into much experience of women, kept himself as warm as could be, without any jealousy.

This stern man bore urgent order for the Viscount Auberley to join the King at once at Oxford, and bring with him all his gathering. Having gathered no men yet, but spent the time in plucking roses and the wild myrtles of Devonshire love, the young Lord was for once a little taken aback at this order. Moreover, though he had been grumbling, half a dozen times a day—to make himself more precious—about the place and the people, and the way they cooked his meals, he really meant it less and less as he came to know the neighbourhood. These are things which nobody can understand without seeing them.

"I grieve, my Lord," said the worthy Baron, "that you must leave us in this hot haste." On the whole, however, this excellent man was partly glad to be quit of him.

"And I am deeply indebted to your Lordship for the grievance; but it must be so. Que voulez vous? You talk the French, mon Baron."

"With a Frenchman, my Lord; but not when I have the honour to speak with an Englishman."

"Ah, there! Foreign again! My Lord, you will never speak English."

De Wichehalse could never be quite sure, though his race had been long in this country, whether he or they could speak born English as it ought to be.

"WHEN WE WERE BOYS TOGETHER."—DRAWN BY A. MUIR

I remember you, Jack, when no bigger than that little girl at your knee,
And surely no twin brothers ever so lovingly cronied as we ;
We lived but one life, so it seemed : both were breeched on the very same day,
We rode on one pony to school, stuck together at work and at play.
Your foes felt my big, clumsy fist, as weighty as any sledge-hammer,
While you did my difficult sums, and undid the knots in my grammar.
When Holiday threw wide the school-door, what boisterous fooling and funning !
O the boating, and batting and bowling ! the racketing, wrestling and running !

And don't you remember the time you twice kicked the football to goal,
When we Gloynes men the Fisherites beat in all that day's games on the Mole ?
One winter so gloriously cold—we thought it was glorious then—
What a mountainous snowball we rolled, and blocked up the door of Old Ben !
In the long summer eves you would sit in that willow o'erhanging the stream,
I busily fishing below, you as busily weaving a dream.
And now we are here, my dear fellow, both hale, in the land of the living,
With your children's children around you—thank God for the taking and giving !—J. L.

EVENSONG—DRAWN BY S. READ.

I see in memory still
The church on Marlow hill—
Our dear old parish-church, that its fair summit crowned;
And ah! the happy meetings,
Warm hand-clasps, tender greetings,
Of families and friends and lovers thither brought;
All praise seemed holier there,
More reverent the prayer,
Though droned by village-folk from twenty hamlets round;

The lich-gate at its front;
The tower which I was wont
By ivy stairs to climb, in search of jackdaw's nest—
That thick-set, sturdy tower,
Which stood a sign of power,
Heedless though winter raved or summer airs caressed;—
All, all come back again,
With pleasure touched with pain,
And many a sweet-sad thought is surging in my breast.

Bright vision of the past!
The painter's skill at last
Has made thee to the present rightly to belong.
As in a fairy story
The past comes back in glory.
Of one fair Christmas Eve what gracious memories throng!
The dear old church that night
Shone as with heavenly light,
And angel voices joined in that blest Evensong.—J. L.

MUSIC.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert was rendered commemorative of the death of Mozart, that event having occurred on Dec. 5, 1791. The selection was accordingly chiefly drawn from the works of that composer. The instrumental pieces were the bright and pretty overture which he wrote for Bianchi's opera, "La Vilanella Rapita" (in 1779); the beautiful pianoforte concerto in E flat, belonging to the year 1785; and the grand symphony in G minor composed in 1788. The concerto was admirably played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, the required cadenzas (left to be improvised or provided by the player) having been her own composition. In these elaborate interpolations, and in her playing generally, Miss Zimmermann was greatly applauded. The orchestral pieces were, of course, worthily rendered by the fine band conducted by Mr. Manns. The vocal selections from Mozart were the aria, "Quando Miro" (1781), finely sung by Miss Sterling; and the air, "In accenti di lamenti," from his early opera, "Zaida" (1780) expressively given by Mdlle. St. Alba. Miss Sterling's rich and sympathetic contralto voice (extending to the compass of a mezzo-soprano) was again displayed with marked effect in German lieder by Schubert, Schumann, and Mendelssohn; which were sung by her (to the original text) with excellent appreciation of their several styles. These were accompanied by Miss Zimmermann. Meyerbeer's romanza, "Roberto," by Mdlle. St. Alba, and Mr. Sullivan's "Ouverture di Ballo," were the closing pieces of the programme. At the concert of to-day (Saturday)—the last of the year—Dr. von Bulow will play Listz's concerto in E flat; and the selection will terminate with Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

This week's Monday Popular Concert drew a crowded audience, and again included the admirable pianoforte-playing of Dr. Hans von Bulow, who was heard in Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia" (encored, and replaced by a gavotte of Gluck); in Schumann's trio (in F) for piano, violin, and violoncello; and Beethoven's sonata in G (op. 96) for the two former instruments. M. Sainton was the leading violinist, and Signor Piatti the violoncellist. The quartet was Mendelssohn's in E minor, from op. 44 (with Mr. L. Ries as second violin and Mr. Zerbini as viola). Mr. Sims Reeves was the vocalist, and Mr. Zerbini the accompanist. The concert of Monday next will be the last of the year—an interval being allowed for the Christmas vacation—the date of the next performance being Jan. 12, 1874.

Dr. von Bulow's fourth and last pianoforte recital took place on Wednesday. The programme included Schubert's posthumous sonata in A major; that by Beethoven in E flat from op. 27, and the same composer's thirty-two variations in C minor; besides miscellaneous pieces by other composers.

The fourth ballad concert (and the last previous to Christmas) was given on Wednesday evening, when the selection offered attractions similar to those of the previous concerts.

The second concert of the Wagner Society was to take place yesterday (Friday) evening, when the promised programme included selections from the composer's operas, "Rienzi," "Tannhauser," and "Lohengrin," besides his "Kaisermarsch," and pieces by Liszt and Von Bulow. Of the performances we must speak next week.

Simultaneously with last night's Wagner Society's concert, the Sacred Harmonic Society was giving its forty-second annual Christmas performance of "The Messiah." Another performance of "The Messiah" at Exeter Hall will be repeated, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, next Friday, the 19th inst., when Madame Sherrington, Miss Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas will be the principal vocalists.

The production, for the first time in England, of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," at the concert of the Royal Albert Choral Society, on Monday next, is looked forward to with great interest.

THEATRES.

In fulfilment of our promise last week, we proceed with a fuller account of the reproduction of Beaumarchais's famous comedy at the Olympic. "The Marriage of Figaro," of Beaumarchais, was the result of its author's visit to Spain, and on its production in 1784, at the Théâtre Français, was at once accepted as a political work of great significance; and, in point of fact, was an element in the forthcoming revolution, which it aided in effecting. Its popularity was such that, on the first night of its representation, a large number of persons occupied the theatre from the morning; and it also held its position on the stage from week to week for no less than two years. No doubt the original idea of the plot was derived from some Spanish dramatists. We have previously had the work in more than one shape on the English stage; now, under the leading title of "The Follies of a Day," and now under that of "The Marriage of Figaro"—now as an opera or melodrama, and now as a farce. Mr. J. Mortimer has aspired to present it to the British stage in a more important form, accompanied with appropriate music selected from Mozart's opera, skilfully arranged by J. Mallandaine. It now comes before us as a drama, in four acts, and claiming to rank as a comedy with Sheridan's "School for Scandal;" wherefore the adapter denominates it "The School for Intrigue." The leading characters in it are sustained by Mr. Neville and Miss Fowler, who as Count Almaviva and Suzanne are admirable representatives of these telling parts, while that of Figaro falls to the lot of Mr. Righton, who sustains it with excellent sangfroid. The Countess is supported by Miss Edith Gray, and Cherubino by Mr. W. H. Fisher. These characters comprehend the moral of the composition, which is to set forth the vice of high life—honour ever on the lips, and infidelity in the heart—while the promiscuous affections of all parties, except one, would bring shame on any class, and make each house a bordel. The exception one is a gipsy wail who has strayed from his tent to take office as a servant among civilised people, and as such regards their vices with indifference, except so far as he can profit by their exhibition. It is the natural man pitted against the artificial, and winning the game by his imperturbable good humour. We sympathise with Figaro in all his difficulties and admire his adroitness; and when at last he gets entangled in the web of sophistries and doubts of the woman he loves sincerely, we pity him in his sorrow and rejoice in his ultimate triumph. Of this woman, equivocal as she is in conduct, we learn at last to think highly, and take a strong interest in her fortunes. Miss Fowler was exceedingly natural in the part, graceful and charming, and from the first scene to the last shed over the whole an enlightening ray, like a fairy intelligence in a dark forest charming the fauns and satyrs with the brightness of her presence. We trust that the performance may be appreciated, and this excellent comedy enjoy a prolonged run.

The committee of the Newport Market Refuge and Industrial School, Sobo, earnestly appeal for funds. The resources of the charity are nearly exhausted, and unless fresh donations and subscriptions are received the refuge and school must be closed.

"LITTLE GOODY TWO-SHOES."

This world is enchanted.
In the present as past
The glamour is cast
Of the magical spell.
Nor alone in deep glen,
Or by soft-tinkling well,
Where glad moonbeams play;
But here, among men,
At our side, in broad day,
Do fairy-folk dwell.

But a double enchantment,
By black art supplied,
So bewitches our sight,
That to us is denied
The blessing to see
These creatures of light
Who dwell by our side,
For you and for me;
For our vision too clear,
So radiantly bright;
Yet we feel they are here,
As the blind only know
The warm sunny glow
By feeling, not sight.

But just as a prism
Light's secret reveals,
So Fancy's pure chiasm
The closed eye unseals.
And folk at our side
Become glorified,
As clouds that were dun
Wax bright in the sun.

Here's a dear Goody Two-Shoes
An artist has caught,
A sweet little fairy
Fresh from Fairyland brought.

This bright Goody, though,
Is not she whom we know—
The portionless maid
Of nursery fame,
Who, so good, came to be
A lady of high degree.
Though another, the same,
As helpful as she,
But fairer and better.
Who once that has seen
This dear Elfin Queen,
Can ever forget her?
For this winsome Missy,
In house-lore called Cissy,
(O, breathe low her name!)
Has grown, be it known,
The charmingest dame;
Not a Juno at all,
But daintily small;
An epitome she
Of all that can be
In womanhood sweetest,
And neatest, completest.

So thousands will grow,
Bud, blossom, and blow;
Right helpful the while,
With ever a smile
Our cares to beguile,
A tear for our woe.
These dear Little Goodies—
The salt of the earth—
Are evermore springing,
New happiness bringing
The homes of their birth.
So loving, they flee not
From beings so cold;
We so blinded, we see not
The angels we hold.—J. LATEY.

CHRISTMAS DAY IN AUSTRALIA.

Old Father Christmas, in the time-honoured procession of ancient English mummers at this sacred and festive season, used to make his welcome appearance wearing a thick robe lined with fur, and otherwise snugly fortified against the winter cold. If the venerable masquerade were still in vogue among our fellow-Englishmen who have made for themselves and their children a new home in the southern hemisphere, Old Father Christmas would have to put on a very different fashion of dress. A linen blouse and a light straw hat would be more comfortable, we suppose, for the kind old patron of their consecrated social mirth in the blazing summer of that opposite terrestrial region. For it is a fact known to every British schoolboy and girl that, as the globe in which we live spins round an axis rather oblique to its annual circuit through space about the sun, the north and the south latitudes of its surface receive their periodical share of the more direct solar rays at contrary times of the year. Hence we are shivering while they of our antipodes must be sweating; and they in turn may take it coolly when some of us will grumble at the heat. But how should we like in our summer a temperature of 100 Fahrenheit degrees in the shade? That is quite within the range of colonial experiences, as we learn from the meteorological reports of the Melbourne Observatory from 1858 to 1871. The maximum in the shade has risen in some years even to 111 degrees at Melbourne, but only during the few hours of a hot wind blowing from the torrid plains of the interior. It has, indeed, they assure us, occurred but on forty-nine days in the lapse of fourteen years at Melbourne that the thermometer has reached 100 degrees. The mean temperature in January, the hottest month, is officially stated at 66.6 degrees, while at Sydney it is 70.9 degrees. But there are some inland districts both of Victoria and New South Wales, shut off by a range of mountains from the sea breezes and the rain-clouds they should bring, which are doomed to suffer a much greater allowance of Christmas excessive warmth.

In spite of this condition of the climate, it appears from our Illustration, drawn by Mr. W. Ralston, that the squatters and diggers are bravely disposed to enjoy themselves à fresco with the roast turkey and plum-pudding, and the after-dinner bowl of punch, that we should consider appropriate to Christmas Day in our own native land. Such luxuries, indeed, can scarcely have been the Chinese fare of this party of sturdy good fellows, whom our Artist has represented as he may often have seen them when he lived in Australia. They are gold-diggers, in the first sketch taking holiday rest outside their huts; in the second, encamped on their road to "a new rush;" each man carrying his moderate rate of "swag" or personal baggage, with their "billy" or can for boiling water, and the frying-pan for their simple cookery, sufficing every want in a tramp of several hundred miles. Nay, they have a sort of tent, even here, slung for the night between two trees; and we see that they have had a bottle of whisky or brandy, which has served to honour the toast of "Auld Lang Syne!" previous to the singing of that beloved song by the true-hearted Scotchman with his arms duly crossed over his manly bosom. A neighbouring stock-rider, who has caught sight of these chums travelling on the border of his run, comes in to share their social mirth, but is too late for his share of the liquor. The bottle is empty; and it is probable that the last drop may have been given to the negro, not a native Australian, but an immigrant, perhaps a runaway sailor, whom we saw in the first scene, if it so happen that the useful "darkey" follows this party to try their luck at the newly-opened diggings.

The Rev. Gerald Molloy, D.D., late Professor of Theology at Maynooth, has been appointed Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Irish Catholic University. He has presented the University with philosophical instruments valued at £600.

The new volume of the "Post Office London Directory" for the coming year, 1874, is published by Messrs. Kelly and Co., a few days earlier than usual, but has admitted some completing or correcting details of information to the end of November. It contains, for example, a list of the members of the newly-elected London School Board, the most recent judicial appointments, and the two new Benchers of the Inner Temple, while it has dropped the names of persons deceased in the course of last month. The bulk of the volume is increased by forty pages in the several departments of the street directory, the commercial, the trades, and the Court directory. There is now to be a moderate addition to its price.

THE MAGAZINES.

The Cornhill is certainly less fortunate than usual in its leading fiction. "Young Brown," though undeniably clever, is not merely disagreeable and cynical, but abounds with thinly-disguised personality, transgressing the limits of social amenity, even more than of literary taste. Nor can "Zelda's Fortune," now approaching its conclusion, be enumerated among Mr. Franchillon's happiest efforts. We turn with pleasure to the miscellaneous contributions, which are fully up to the usual standard. The best is the very entertaining and, although by no means sympathetic, by no means unjust, sketch of the members of "the Fourth Estate" in France. Our press and our public may equally congratulate themselves that journalism is not ordinarily here, as there, a path to office. An article on elementary-school teaching as a pursuit for ladies, while displaying its advantages equally to the sex and the scholars in a strong light, concludes with the salutary admonition that physical strength is even more requisite than intellectual. A paper on the Christian archaeology of Rome, and another on the Tuscan Joe Miller, Arlotto, are excellent specimens of the refined yet popular disquisitions on intellectual subjects in which this periodical especially excels.

Macmillan is unusually interesting this month. We must not spoil the pleasure of the readers of Mr. Black's beautiful story, but cannot refrain from stating that the conclusion is happy. Dr. Schwartz's "Religion of Goethe" is, perhaps, the most interesting contribution to any of the magazines. Being designed to set forth Goethe's ideal rather than his actual practice, it may be deemed in some respects too favourable to him; but, after all, it can hardly be held to transgress the limits prescribed by the undoubted right of every man of genius to be judged by his best; while a more beautiful collection of thoughts, united by a finer and firmer thread of conscious moral purpose, it would be difficult to find. Mr. Sedley Taylor's article on Galileo, besides establishing the astronomer's unswerving belief in the truth of the Copernican system, pins the Infallibilists down to a distinct admission of Papal error on the principles set forth by themselves. "A Lincolnshire Rector" agreeably illustrates numerous passages in Mr. Tennyson's poems by the characteristic scenery of his native county; and the widely different aspects of Spanish peasant-life are picturesquely treated in a sequel to the previous paper on the same subject. Mr. Simcox's "Mirage" is a highly successful study in the manner of Mr. Rossetti, and his story "after the Chinese" rises even higher above the average level of magazine poetry.

The views of one eminent sculptor respecting another should be worth having, and Mr. Story's essay upon Phidias in the pages of Blackwood, if not strictly a contribution to aesthetic criticism, demonstrates at least the soundness of his classical scholarship. He produces good arguments for considering that Phidias never wrought in marble, and that none of the friezes and metopes of the Parthenon were even designed by him, though he unquestionably bestowed a general supervision on the work. "A Story of the Rock" is an agreeable example of the style of military fiction characteristic of Blackwood. More interest attaches to two papers of a political character. In "The Conservative Party and National Education" we observe with pleasure a most unusual candour and fairness, and a disposition to regard the question from the point of view of the general good, irrespective of party considerations. If this method of dealing with the matter is really the best for Conservative interests, so much the better for the Conservatives. A finely-written paper on the political situation in France is from the pen of a disappointed Legationist, who cannot forgive the Count de Chambord for his gras riposte, and prognosticates, as a consequence, the triumph of Democratic Imperialism, of the Prince Napoleon type. The ephemeral character of Marshal MacMahon's administration is assumed as self-evident, from which we infer that it is destined to endure for a considerable time.

We wish there were nothing worse to be said of the article on Mill's autobiography in Fraser than that it is the work of a stupid, or at least of an obtuse, person, utterly incompetent to appreciate moral or intellectual greatness. Its admission into pages so frequently honoured by contributions from the illustrious dead is deeply discreditable to the present management of the magazine. "The Future of Farming" is a thoughtful paper, prognosticating an accession of political influence to the agricultural class. "A Review of Spanish Struggles for Liberty" takes a more favourable view of the prospects of the Republic than is usually entertained. We should feel more confidence in the writer's judgment of the future if he showed himself better acquainted with the past. He might have saved himself a good deal of paradoxical vituperation of England's interference in Spanish affairs during the Peninsular War if he had remembered that our aid was not primarily destined for Spain, but for Portugal. "A Trip into Bosnia" and "The Historical Manuscripts' Commission" are interesting contributions; and "A Cutcherry Intrigue" is so graphic that, in spite of the writer's protests, it is difficult to avoid the suspicion that incidents and characters are equally derived from life.

The most remarkable paper in the Fortnightly, Mr. F. W. Newman's "Modern Christology," in reply to Mr. W. R. Greg, we can only, in this place, describe as characterised by the most salient of the author's points of difference from his celebrated brother—his singular unimaginativeness. Mr. Symonds's masterly versions from Boiardo's "Orlando Innamorato" will, we trust, do much to popularise a neglected poet, whose decided but unacknowledged superiority to his more celebrated successor, Ariosto, is that which pure Nature always asserts over conscious Art. Boiardo flourished on the verge of two periods, at the one only moment when the narrow of an age of chivalry admitted of combination with the refinement of an age of culture. No such moment can recur in the history of modern European literature, and its one consummate memorial should be esteemed an invaluable treasure. Mr. Symonds's criticism is as fine as his translation. Sir C. W. Dilke contributes a spirited plea for gratuitous education, and Mr. Leslie Stephen an able review of Taine's history of English literature. The brilliant Frenchman's utter inability to enter into the peculiar spirit of our literature is forcibly depicted. Frenchmen can seldom comprehend anything in another country for which they cannot find a precedent in their own; and, with every respect to the excellences of their literature, it is to ours as a lake to an ocean.

Unless subsequent instalments of Mrs. Browning's letters to Mr. R. H. Horne prove more interesting than the present, the expectations aroused by the announcement of their publication in the Contemporary Review will be disappointed. Those at present published bear date 1839, and relate to literary topics now of very slight interest. Mr. Fitzjames Stephen's essay on Parliamentary Government is a valuable piece of criticism. We think, however, that really organic reforms in any system of government can only come from those who are convinced of its essential reasonableness, not those who, like Mr. Stephen in this instance, regard it as an infliction to be mitigated and endured. Dr. Littledale's paper on "The Relation of the Clergy to Politics" is as brilliant, paradoxical, and suggestive as usual with him. He ancerely believes in the possibility of reconciling clerical influence with advanced political Liberalism: the mass both of clericals and of Liberals know better. Mr. Capes's notice of Mill's autobiography contains some just observations, such as his remarks on the slight influence exercised on the development of Mill's intellect by his Greek studies. Some strictures on what he terms the mythical character of Mill's account of his education are founded on his own oversight in mistaking the date of the elder Mill's appointment to the India House.

The most valuable contributions to a generally readable number of Saint Pauls are two able criticisms on two remarkable men—the Hon. Roden Noel's essay on Byron and "Henry Holbeach's" notes on Mill's autobiography. Each has the cardinal merits of fulness of sympathy, of an earnest and thoughtful endeavour to enter into the intimate nature of the character described, and of a generous breadth of view. Mr. Noel's language is, moreover, distinguished by dignity and eloquence.

Among the selections of the Transatlantic we have to note a review of the schemes proposed for amending the faulty electoral machinery of the United States, a capital ghost story, an interesting sketch of the secluded rustic population of Eastern Tennessee, and, above all, the continuation of Mr. Welles's disclosures of the deliberations of President Lincoln's Cabinet during the early days of Secession. As we have always supposed, the apparently unaccountable vacillation of the Washington Government proves to have been due to the influence of Mr. Seward, a politician so accustomed to carry his point by intrigue that the idea of a resort to arms was intolerable to him.

Beyond some unpublished letters of Charles Lamb's in the Gentleman's Magazine, pleasant but not of extraordinary interest, the lighter periodicals contain little worthy of special note. We can only say, in general terms, that Temple Bar, the Argosy, Belgravia, and London Society, are fairly readable. The most valuable contribution to Good Words is Professor Wyville Thomson's interesting report of the scientific voyage of the Challenger. We may also notice the conclusion of Principal Tulloch's excellent biography of William the Silent, and four stanzas of unusual tenderness, entitled "The Cycle," and subscribed "C. Brooke."

We have, in addition, received the New Monthly, the Victoria, the Monthly Packet, Town and Country, Cassell's Magazine, the Quiver, Golden Hours, and the Sunday Magazine.

Christmas Numbers have been issued in connection with Belgravia, Tinsley's Magazine, the Monthly Packet, Good Words, All the Year Round, and Once a Week. Routledge's Christmas Annual has also been published.

"EQUO NE CREDITE TEUCRI!"

To realise the allusion of the title of this amusing picture by Mr. Briton Riviere (which we engrave from the Dudley Gallery Exhibition) it is not necessary to recount the whole story of the capture of Troy as told by Æneas to Queen Dido. Readers of Virgil will remember the circumstances under which the words quoted occur. The Greeks pretended to have raised the siege and fled, leaving behind them in their haste the colossal horse which Sinon falsely asserted to have been constructed by them to appease the offended Minerva. What to do with the monster the Trojans (or Teucri, as they were called, after the name of their founder) knew not. Some proposed to burn it, some to cast it into the sea, or bore into its hollow inside; but Thymetes was for dragging it into the citadel as a trophy. Thereupon Laocoon, the priest, rushed from the citadel, exclaiming, "What madness do I hear? O misguided citizens, beware! Some wile is here; trust not the horse, O ye Teucri! Mischief it bodys. Greeks and their gifts I fear." So, in a very droll sort of paraphrase, the artist addresses these little Teucri, as they try to maintain their seat on the back of that great ungainly brute. Trust not the monster. He is full of mischief; he is wily, and vicious, and obstinate; he will surely compass your fall, O ye brave little Trojans! He is halting and stumbling now; he may bolt presently; look at the vicious set of his ears; look at that backward, wily turn of the evil eye; look at that Roman nose—what obstinacy does it not indicate! How resentfully he pulls at the cord, and how little does your puny strength avail to thwart the gigantic brute, O thou too daring and trustful chief of the Lilliputian Trojans!

HOLLAND HOUSE, SOUTH FRONT.

HOLLAND HOUSE.

When the marriage of Miss Marie Fox, Lady Holland's adopted daughter, to a German Prince at the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Kensington was the talk of London society for a week in the Midsummer season of 1872, we presented a few illustrations of Holland House, with an account of its historical and literary associations. The accomplished young lady to whom our congratulations were then duly offered—now Princess Marie Liechtenstein, residing at Vienna—has compiled a very attractive and interesting book on that subject, which is naturally endeared to her by grateful remembrances of her childhood passed in the noble old suburban mansion. These two handsome volumes, dedicated to the memory of Henry Edward, fourth and last Lord Holland, who died in 1859, are a most graceful tribute of domestic affection. The narrative affords us much pleasant knowledge of clever men and fashionable women distinguished in past generations. The outward embellishments of paper, type, and binding, and more especially the abundance of fine steel and wood engravings and photographs, are worthy of an elegant memoir that treats of such a topic as the inner life of an aristocratic family and their household arrangements. Mr. Philip de la Motte, the artistic draughtsman, and Mr. Jeans, Mr. Jewitt, and others, the engravers, have done their part with good effect in aid of the clear and exact descriptions of the building, its furniture, and the gardens; besides which several family portraits, by eminent painters of the day, have been engraved for this book. Those of the late Lord Holland and his widow, the present Lady Holland, which appear in the frontispiece and titlepage vignette of the first volume, are by Mr. G. F. Watts; their faces are very engaging. We borrow the Engraving which represents the south front of Holland House by permission of the publishers, Messrs. Macmillan and Co. It was stated in our former notice that this south front was altered in the late Lord Holland's time; the central projecting turret of stone, built by Inigo Jones, no longer contains the main entrance porch.

GENERAL WASHINGTON RYAN.

The execution at Santiago, in Cuba, of the American and British citizens captured on board the blockade-running steamer Virginus, while attempting to convey arms and warlike stores from Jamaica for the Cuban insurgents against the Spanish Government, has nearly provoked war between Spain and the United States. The Virginus was cut off by two Spanish frigates on Oct. 30, and surrendered without resistance. The crew and passengers were manacled and landed at Santiago, where the prisoners were placed in gaol. Among them were Generals Varona, Del Sol, Cespedes, and Ryan, and some twenty Jamaica labouring men or mechanics. On Nov. 5 the four Generals were taken out and shot in front of the slaughter house—Cespedes and Del Sol first, then Ryan and Varona; the two latter, refusing to kneel, were rather roughly handled, but were presently dispatched. General Bernabo Varona, a young Cuban officer educated in the United States, was chief in command of the party on board the Virginus; next to him were Colonel José Jesus del Sol, Pedro Cespedes, and General Ryan, the other three who were shot with Varona. Washington Ryan was an Irish-American, who had been engaged in the Cuban service since the breaking out of the rebellion. He had much to do with the fitting out of gun-boats that were built for the Cubans in New York in 1869, and he was arrested when they were seized. He was again arrested in another vessel which attempted to sail from New York to Cuba; and he had in many ways made his name notorious as a Cuban agent. Colonel del Sol was a wealthy Cuban, who during four years had held a command in the insurgent army. He was about forty years old, and his family live in New York. Pedro Cespedes was a brother of the President of the Cuban Republic. About fifty other men taken in the Virginus were executed on the 7th and 8th ult. Among them were Juan Agnerro, a wealthy planter, sixty-five years old, who struck the first blow in the insurrection, which began five years ago; Captain Gratz Brown, an American of Philadelphia, who had been for some time in the service of the insurgents as a spy; Senor Santa Rosa, a Cuban by birth, but a naturalised American citizen, who was a determined blockade-runner, and was released from prison in Havannah only three months ago by the intercession of the American Government; and Senor Hernandez, a wealthy planter of Matanzas. The other members of the expedition were chiefly young Cubans, who had been living some time in the United States. Nearly all left relatives behind them in that country. The Spanish Government at Madrid has complied with the demands of the United States by sending orders to the Governor of Cuba to restore the Virginus to her owners, with an apology to the American and British Governments for the slaughter of their subjects. The Portrait of General Washington Ryan is from a photograph by Mr. Brady, of New York.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S STUDENTS' PIANOFORTE.

Five Octaves, F to F, Check Action. Trichord Treble. Price FIFTEEN GUINEAS.

This instrument has been designed by Mr. John Hullah expressly for the use of Students, and will be found invaluable where space or portability is an object. The compass is quite sufficient for classical music—the whole of Mozart's and contemporary works being written within the five octaves F to F, as the pianofortes of that date did not exceed that compass.

For practice in Schools or Colleges they will be equally welcome, as more economical than using larger and more expensive instruments.—ChapPELL and CO., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S YACHT PIANO.

With Folding Keyboard, Check Action, Trichord Treble. In solid Mahogany, or Black Canadian Walnut Case, THIRTY GUINEAS; or in Maple, THIRTY-FIVE GUINEAS. Constructed for Ship's Cabin, to occupy the smallest possible space and to stand the damp of a sea voyage; the back is strengthened with iron bars and metallic plates, and the whole of the mechanism is of the best quality.—ChapPELL and CO., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.

Trichord, Oblique, and Check Action. Compass, Seven Octaves. Full and rich in tone and perfect in touch. Price, in Rosewood, 45 gu.; in Walnut, 50 gu.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S ORIENTAL MODEL PIANOFORTE.

Iron Frame, Trichord throughout, Check Action, Seven Octaves, solid Mahogany or Black Walnut Case, and Check Action, FORTY-THREE GUINEAS; with Plain Action, THIRTY-EIGHT GUINEAS.

Made expressly to withstand the heat and moisture of extreme climates. Every part that is glued is also secured with screws. The felt on the hammers, &c., is fastened with pins. The black and silk frame are lined with perforated zinc, to keep out damp and insects; and every precaution taken that has been suggested by persons who have had many years' experience in the care of musical instruments in India and China.

Testimonials of the durability of these instruments can be seen at 50, New Bond-street. The price includes—1, Packing-Cases of tin and wood; 2, A suitable tuning-hammer or key; 3, A tuning-fork; 4, Some additional strings; 5, A Book on Tuning and Preserving the Instrument; 6, And the Carriage to the Dock.

CHAPPELL'S English Model COTTAGE PIANOFORTE.

To amateurs preferring the pure English tone of the Broadwood and Collard quality, the English Model will be found the most satisfactory instrument, at a moderate price. The action is of the same simple description as the above makers, and therefore especially adapted to the country, where the more complicated actions are objectionable to the tuner.

In elegant Rosewood Case, with full fret, similar in all respects to other instruments at 50 gu. price 26 gu.; with handsome brass legs, 43 gu.; in splendid Walnut (similar to other 50-guinea instruments), price 33 gu.; with handsome brass legs, 49 gu. Seven Octaves (A to A).

CHAPPELL'S ENGLISH 20-GUINEA or SCHOOL-ROOM PIANOFORTE.

With Check Action, in Canadian Walnut, Mahogany, also, in Solid Oak or White Ash, 22 gu., and in elegant Rosewood or Walnut Case, 27 gu. This instrument combines good quality of tone and excellence of workmanship. It has the merit of standing well in tune, and is capable of enduring hard school practice without going out of order.

CHAPPELL'S FULL COTTAGE PIANOFORTE.

Trichord Treble. 7 Octaves. Price, in elegant Rosewood Case, Bath-pattern desk, carved legs, &c., 50 gu.; in elegant Italian Walnut Case, with carved legs, 60 gu.; with the Action and Trichord throughout, 10 gu. extra. A rich and powerful instrument, with a perfect and sympathetic touch equal in power to a Small Grand.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S MODEL PIANETTE.

In Italian Walnut or Rosewood Case, 7 Octaves, Check Action, Trichord Treble, and newly-improved Celeste Pedal. Price 25 gu.; with elegant carved frame and plain legs, 4 gu. extra. The above will be found most powerful and effective than the smaller instruments, termed Pianinos. The touch is smooth and elastic, and the tone sufficient to fill an ordinary-sized drawing-room.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM OF HIRING ALEXANDRE'S HARMONIUMS.

In these cases the instrument must be hired for three years certain, and, provided each quarterly instalment shall have been regularly paid in advance, the instrument becomes the property of the hirer at the expiration of the third year.

The Three-Years' System is applicable to all other kinds of Harmoniums. Residents abroad can be supplied with Harmoniums on this system, the hire being paid annually instead of quarterly, in advance. Illustrated Catalogues, with a Drawing and Dimensions of each instrument, sent post-free on application to ChapPELL and CO.

THE ALEXANDRE NEW SEVEN-GUINEA ORGAN HARMONIUM.

Solid Oak Case, Five Octaves, and Two Footboards. The ever-increasing musical culture in all classes of society has created a demand for free reed instruments of a superior quality to those hitherto manufactured.

The instruments now offered to the public will be found directed of all that has hitherto been considered objectionable as regards tone. This end has been obtained by using a larger and thicker tongue, and a new system of voicing, which render the quality rich and organ-like.

Another advantage in the new system is the increased strength of the reeds, and diminished liability to go out of tune by forcing the bellows. The new system is applied to all the large instruments with still greater effect, and without extra cost.

DULCIANA ORGAN HARMONIUM.

Alexandre.—This New Instrument is specially adapted to the Drawing-Room. It has the sweetest tone possible, resembling the soft dulciana stop of the best organs, and with a new patent air-chest, if free from the slightest harshness. Price, 3 stops, oak, 12 gu.; mahogany, 13 gu.; rosewood, 16 gu.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S NEW ORGAN HARMONIUM.

Alexandre, 7 Stops, 12 Row of Vibrations. The harmonium is beautifully carved Oak Case. Price 17 gu.; polished, 19 gu. or 6 gu. per year for three years.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S ORGAN HARMONIUM.

On the THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM. The instruments have the round tone of the Organ without the disadvantage of requiring tuning, with much quicker articulation than the American Organs, and at half the cost, as ORGANS for DRAWING-ROOM or CHURCHES, from 50 gu. to 300 gu. for SALE or Hire, on the Three-Years' System. Specifications for Organs suitable for any building or climate sent on application to ChapPELL and CO., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S MINIATURE ORGAN.

In Polished Walnut Case, elegantly carved and decorated, compass, C to G, 4½ octaves. Size, 5 ft. by 2 ft. 6 in. height, 6 ft. 3 in. Price 50 gu. Inclosed in retail. Two to be blown. Small pedal for knee. The tone of this instrument will be found softer and sweeter than any organ yet produced, and a still of sufficient power to fill a large-sized room. It is extremely easy to blow, and is placed on a level with the greatest ease, as it is held about with the greatest facility. The organ is very little more than a cottage piano. German pedal. Inclosed at an extra cost of from five to ten guineas.

CHAPPELL AND CO.'S CHNACKL ORGAN.

Pine Case, varnished. Compass, 4½ octaves, C to G; 3½ octaves of Pedals, 4 Stops. Hand and foot blowers. Made of the best seasoned materials, and with the greatest care. Size, 5 ft. by 2 ft. 2 in.; height, 9 ft. Price 70 gu.

THE DIGITORIUM; or, Miniature Dumb Piano (Patent).

Recommended by all the leading Professors of Music. This instrument materially assists any person to play the Piano, Organ, Harmonium, Violin, &c., strengthening the fingers, giving the most easy and perfect execution, and greatly assisting the student anxious to gain proficiency. Price 15 gu.; with ivory keys, 20 gu. The instrument is an invention for strengthening and equalizing the power of the fingers. It consists of a dumb keyboard of ivory keys only, which are sprung lightly, heavily, or to medium strength, as may be required by those using the apparatus. At the bottom of the instrument a slide is made to draw out, which supports a small block of wood, intended for the wrist, and to relieve the muscles of the arm, which are not required to be brought into action. This slide may be drawn out to suit the length of the arm, as it accommodates the direction of the touch. Small blocks of wood, half circles, are fastened upon the sides of the instrument, which used to produce great tension of the fingers.

CHAPTER I.

FRANZISKA.

It is a Christmas morning—cold, still, and grey, with a frail glimmer of sunshine coming through the bare trees to melt the hoar-frost on the lawn. The postman has just gone out, swinging the gate behind him. A fire burns brightly in the breakfast-room; and there is silence about the house, for the children have gone off to climb Box-hill before being marched to church.

The small and gentle lady who presides over this household walks sedately in, and lifts the solitary letter that is lying on her plate. About three seconds suffice to let her run through its contents, and then she suddenly cries,

"I knew it! I said it! I told you two months ago she was only flirting with him; and now she has rejected him. And, oh, I am so glad of it! The poor boy!"

The other person in the room, who has been meekly waiting for his breakfast for half an hour, ventures to point out that there is nothing to rejoice over in the fact of a young man having been rejected by a young woman.

"If it were final, yes! If these two young folks were not certain to go and marry somebody else, you might congratulate them both. But you know they will. The poor boy will go courting again in three months' time, and be vastly pleased with his condition."

"Oh, never, never!" she says; "he has had such a lesson. You know I warned him. I knew she was only flirting with him. Poor Charlie! Now I hope he will get on with his profession, and leave such things out of his head. And as for that creature—"

"I will do you the justice to say," observes her husband, who is still regarding the table with a longing eye, "that you did oppose this match, because you hadn't the making of it. If you had brought these two together they would have been married ere this. Never mind; you can marry him to somebody of your own choosing, now."

"No; he must not think of marriage. He cannot think of it. It will take the poor lad a long time to get over this blow."

"He will marry within a year."

"I will bet you whatever you like that he doesn't," she says, triumphantly.

"Whatever I like! That is a big wager. If you lose, do you think you could pay? I should like, for example, to have my own way in my own house."

"If I lose you shall," says the generous creature; and the bargain is concluded.

Nothing further is said about this matter for the moment. The children return from Box-hill, and are rigged out for church. Two young people, friends of ours, and recently married, having no domestic circle of their own, and, having promised to spend the whole of Christmas Day with us, arrive. Then we set out, trying as much as possible to think that Christmas Day is different from any other day, and pleased to observe that the younger folk, at least, cherish the delusion.

But just before we reach the church, I say to the small lady who got the letter in the morning, and whom we generally call Tita,

"When do you expect to see Charlie?"

"I don't know," she answers. "After this cruel affair he won't like to go about much."

"You remember that he promised to go with us to the Black Forest?"

"Yes; and I am sure it will be a pleasant trip for him."

"Shall we go to Hüferschingen?"

"I suppose so."

"Franziska is a pretty girl."

Now, you would not think that any great mischief could be done by the mere remark that Franziska was a pretty girl. Anybody who had seen Franziska Fahler, niece of the proprietor of the "Goldenen Bock" in Hüferschingen would admit that in a moment. But this is nevertheless true, that Tita was very thoughtful during the rest of our walk to this little church; and in church, too, she was thinking so deeply that she almost forgot to look at the effect of the decorations she had nailed up the day before. Yet nothing could have offended her in the bare observation that Franziska was a pretty girl.

At dinner, in the evening, we had our two guests and a few young fellows from London who did not happen to have their families or homes there. Curiously enough, there was a vast deal of talk about travelling, and also about Baden, and more particularly about the southern districts of Baden. Tita said the Black Forest was the most charming place in the world; and as it was Christmas Day, and as we had been listening to a sermon all about charity, and kindness, and consideration for others, nobody was rude enough to contradict her. But our forbearance was put to a severe test when, after dinner, she produced a photographic album and handed it round, and challenged everybody to say whether the young lady in the corner was not absolutely lovely. Most of them said that she was certainly very nice-looking; and Tita seemed a little disappointed. I perceived that it would no longer do to say that Franziska was a pretty girl. We should henceforth have to swear by everything we held dear that she was absolutely lovely.

CHAPTER II.

ZUM GOLDENEN BOCK.

We felt some pity for the lad when we took him abroad with us; but it must be confessed that at first he was not a very desirable travelling companion. There was a gloom about him. Despite the eight months that had elapsed, he professed that his old wound was still open. Tita treated him with the kindest maternal solicitude, which was a great mistake: tonics, not sweets, are required in such cases. Yet he was very grateful; and he said, with a blush, that, in any case, he would not rail against all women because of the badness of one. Indeed, you would not have fancied he had any great grudge against womankind. There were a great many English abroad that autumn, and we met whole batches of pretty girls at every station and every table d'hôte on our route. Did he avoid them, or glare at them savagely, or say hard things of them? Oh, no!—quite the reverse. He was a little shy at first; and when he saw a party of distressed damsels in a station, and their bewildered father in vain attempting to make himself understood to a porter, he would assist them in a brief and business-like manner, as if it were a duty, lift his cap, and then march off, relieved. But by-and-by he began to make acquaintances in the hotels; and, as he was a handsome, English-looking lad, who bore a certificate of honesty in his clear grey eyes and easy gait, he was rather made much of. Nor could any fault be decently found with his appetite.

So we passed on from Königswinter to Coblenz, and from Coblenz to Heidelberg, and from Heidelberg south to Freiburg, where we bade adieu to the last of the towns and laid hold of a trap with a pair of ancient and angular horses, and plunged into the Hölenthal, the first great gorge of the Black Forest mountains. From one point to another we slowly urged our devious course, walking the most of the day indeed, and putting the trap and ourselves up for the night at some quaint roadside hostelry, where we ate of roe-deer, and drank of Affenthaler, and endeavoured to speak German with a pure Waldshut accent. And then one evening, when there was a clear green-and-gold sky overhead, and when the last rays of the sun were shining along the hills and touching the stems of the tall pines, we drove into a narrow valley and caught sight of a strange building of wood, with projecting eaves and quaint windows, that stood close by the forest.

"Here is my dear inn," cried Tita, with a great glow of delight and affection in her face. "Here is mein gutes Thal! Ich grüß' dich ein tausend Mal! And here is old Peter come out to see us; and there is Franziska!"

"Oh! this is Franziska, is it?" said Charlie.

Yes, this was Franziska. She was a well-built, handsome girl of nineteen or twenty, with a healthy, sun-burnt complexion, and dark hair plaited into two long tails which were taken up and twisted into a knot behind. That you could see from a distance. But on nearer approach you found that Franziska had really fine and intelligent features, and a pair of frank, clear, big brown eyes that had a very straight look about them. They were something of the eyes of a deer, indeed; wide apart, soft, and apprehensive, yet looking with a certain directness and unconsciously that overcame her natural girlish timidity. Tita simply flew at her and kissed her heartily, and asked her twenty questions at once. Franziska answered in very fair English, a little slow and formal, but quite grammatical. Then she was introduced to Charlie, and she shook hands with him in a simple and unembarrassed way, and then she turned to one of the servants and gave some directions about the luggage. Finally, she begged Tita to go indoors and get off her travelling attire, which was done, leaving us two outside.

"She's a very pretty girl," Charlie said, carelessly. "I suppose she's sort of head cook and kitchen-maid here."

The impudence of these young men is something extraordinary.

"If you wish to have your head in your hands," I remarked to him, "just you repeat that remark at dinner. Why, Franziska is no end of a swell. She has two thousand pounds and the half a mill. She has a sister married to the Geheimer-Ober-Hofbaurath of Hesse-Cassel. She has visited both Paris and Munich; and she has her dresses made in Freiburg."

"But why does such an illustrious creature bury herself in this valley, and in an old inn, and go about bareheaded?"

"Because there are folks in the world without ambition, who like to live a quiet, decent, homely life. Every girl can't marry a Geheimer-Ober-Hofbaurath. Ziska, now, is much more likely to marry the young doctor here."

"Oh, indeed! and live here all her days. She couldn't do better. Happy Franziska!"

We went indoors. It was a low, large, rambling place, with one immense room all hung round with roe-deers' horns, and with one lesser room fitted up with a billiard-table. The inn lay a couple of hundred yards back from Hüferschingen, but it had been made the head-quarters of the keepers, and just outside this room were a number of pegs for them to sling their guns and bags on when they came in of an evening to have a pipe and a chopin of white wine. Ziska's uncle and aunt were both large, stout, and somnolent people, very good-natured and kind, but a trifle dull. Ziska really had the management of the place, and she was not slow to lend a hand if the servants were remiss in waiting on us. But that, it was understood, was done out of compliment to our small Queen Tita.

By-and-by we sat down to dinner, and Franziska came to see that everything was going on straight. It was a dinner "with scenery." You forgot to be particular about the soup, the venison, and the Affenthaler, when from the window at your elbow you could look across the narrow valley and behold a long stretch of the Black Forest shining in the red glow of the sunset. The lower the sun sank the more intense became the crimson light on the tall stems of the pines; and then you could see the line of shadow slowly rising up the side of the opposite hill until only the topmost trees were touched with the fire. Then these, too, lost it, and all the forest around us seemed to have a pale blue mist stealing over it as the night fell and the twilight faded out of the sky overhead. Presently the long undulations of fir would grow black, and the stars would come out, and the sound of the stream be heard distantly in the hollow; and then, as Tita knew, we should go off for a last stroll in among the soft moss and under the darkness of the pines, perhaps to startle some great capercaillie and send it flying and whirling down the glades.

When we returned from that prow into the forest we found the inn dark. Such people as may have called in had gone home; but we suspected that Franziska had given the neighbours a hint not to overwhelm us on our first arrival. When we entered the big room Franziska came in with candles; then she brought some matches, and also put on the table an odd little pack of cards, and went out. Her uncle and aunt had, even before we went out, come and bade us good night formally and shaken hands all round. They are early folk in the Black Forest.

"Where has that girl gone now?" says Charlie. "Into that lonely billiard-room? Couldn't you ask her to come in here? Or shall we go and play billiards?"

Tita stares, and then demurely smiles; but it is with an assumed severity that she rebukes him for such a wicked proposal, and reminds him that he must start early next morning. He groans assent. Then she takes her leave.

The big young man sits silent for a moment or two, with his hands in his pockets and his legs stretched out. I begin to think I am in for it—the old story of blighted hopes, and angry denunciation, and hypocritical joy, and all the rest of it. But suddenly Charlie looks up with a business-like air, and says,

"Who is that doctor fellow you were speaking about? Shall we see him to-morrow?"

"You saw him to-night. It was he who passed us on the road with the two beagles."

"What, that little fellow with the bandy legs and the spectacles?" he cries, with a great laugh.

"That little fellow," I observe to him, "is a person of some importance, I can tell you. He—"

"I suppose his sister married a Geheimer-ober-under-what the dickens is it?" says this disrespectful young man.

"Dr. Krumm has got the Iron Cross."

"That won't make his legs any the straighter."

"He was at Weissenburg."

"I suppose he got that cast in the eye there."

"He can play the zither in a way that would astonish you. He has got a little money. Franziska and he would be able to live very comfortably together."

"Franziska and that fellow?" says Charlie; and then he rises with a sulky air, and proposes we should take our candles with us.

But he is not sulky very long; for Ziska, hearing our footsteps, comes to the passage and bids us a friendly good-night.

"Good-night, Miss Fahler!" he says, in rather a shame-faced way; "and I am so awfully sorry we have kept you up so late. We shan't do it again."

You would have thought by his manner that it was two o'clock; whereas it was only half-past eleven!

CHAPTER III.

DR. KRUMM.

There was no particular reason why Dr. Krumm should marry Franziska Fahler, except that he was the most important young man in Hüferschingen, and she was the most important young woman. People therefore thought they would make a good match; although Franziska certainly had the most to give in the way of good looks. Dr. Krumm was a short, bandy-legged, sturdy young man, with long fair hair, a tanned complexion, light blue eyes, not quite looking the same way, spectacles, and a general air of industrious common-sense about him, if one may use such a phrase. There was certainly little of the lover in his manner towards Ziska, and as little in hers towards him. They were very good friends, though, and he called her Ziska, while she gave him his nickname of Fidelio, his real name being Fidele.

Now on this, the first morning of our stay in Hüferschingen, all the population had turned out at an early hour to see us set out for the forest; and as the Ober-Förster had gone away to visit his parents in Bavaria, Dr. Krumm was appointed to superintend the operations of the day. And when everybody was busy renewing acquaintance with us, gathering in the straying dogs, examining guns and cartridge-belts, and generally aiding in the profound commotion of our setting out, Dr. Krumm was found to be talking in a very friendly and familiar manner with our pretty Franziska. Charlie eyed them askance. He began to say disrespectful things of Krumm. He thought Krumm a plain person. And then, when the bandy-legged doctor had got all the dogs, keepers, and beaters together, we set off along the road, and presently plunged into the cool shade of the forest, where the thick moss suddenly silenced our footsteps, and where there was a moist and resinous smell in the air.

Well, the incidents of the forenoon's shooting, picturesque as they were, and full of novelty to Tita's protégé, need not be described. At the end of the fourth drive, when we had got on nearly to luncheon-time, it appeared that Charlie had killed a handsome buck, and he was so pleased with this performance that he grew friendly with Dr. Krumm, who had, indeed, given him the haupt-stelle. But when, as we sat down to our sausages and bread and red wine, Charlie incidentally informed our commander-in-chief that, during one of the drives, a splendid yellow fox had come out of the underwood and stood and stared at him for three or four seconds, the Doctor uttered a cry of despair.

"I should have told you that," he said in English, that was not quite so good as Ziska's, "if I had remembered, yes! The English will not shoot the foxes; but they are very bad for us, they kill the young deer, we are glad to shoot them; and Franziska she told me she wanted a yellow fox for the skin to make something."

Charlie got very red in the face. He had missed a chance. If he had known that Franziska wanted a yellow fox for all the instinctive veneration for that animal that was in him would have gone clean out, and the fate of the animal—for Charlie was a smart shot—would have been definitely sealed.

"Are there many of them?" said he, gloomily.

"No; not many. But where there is one there are generally four or five. In the next drive we may come on them, yes! I will put you in a good place, Sir; and you must not think of letting him go away, for Franziska, who has waited two, three weeks, and not one yellow fox not anywhere, and it is for the variety of the skin in a — a — I do not know what you call it."

"A rug, I suppose," said Charlie.

I subsequently heard that Mr. Charles went to his post with a fixed determination to shoot anything of yellow colour that came near him. His station was next to that of Dr. Krumm; but of course they were invisible to each other. The horns of the beaters sounded a warning; the gunners cocked their guns and stood on the alert; in the perfect silence each one waited for the first glimmer of a brown hide down the long green glades of young fir. Then, according to Charlie's account, he went two or three deer like lightning—all of them does. A buck came last, but swerved just as he came in sight, and backed and made straight for the line of beaters. Two more does, and then an absolute blank. One or two shots had been heard at a distance; either some of the more distant stations had been more fortunate, or one or other of the beaters had tried his luck. Suddenly there was a shot fired close to Charlie—he knew it must have been the Doctor. In about a minute afterwards he saw some pale yellow object slowly worming its way through the ferns; and here, at length, he made sure he was going to get his yellow fox. But, just as the animal came within fair distance, it turned over, made a struggle or two, and lay still. Charlie rushed along to the spot; it was, indeed, a yellow fox, shot in the head, and now as dead as a door-nail.

What was he to do? Let Dr. Krumm take home this prize to Franziska, after he had had such a chance in the forenoon? Never! Charlie fired a barrel into the air, and then calmly awaited the coming up of the beaters and the drawing together of the sportsmen.

Dr. Krumm, being at the next station, was the first to arrive. He found Charlie standing by the side of the slain fox.

"Ha!" he said, his spectacles apparently gleaming delight. "You have shotted him! You have killed him! That is very good!—that is excellent! Now, you will present the skin to Miss Franziska, if you do not wish to take it to England."

"Oh, no!" said Charlie, with a lordly indifference. "I don't care about it. Franziska may have it."

Charlie pulled me aside, and said, with a solemn wink, "Krumm shot that fox. Mind you don't say a word. I must have the skin to present to Franziska."

I stared at him; I had never known him guilty of a dishonest action. But when you do get a decent young English fellow condescending to do anything shabby, be sure it is a girl who is the cause. I said nothing, of course; and in the evening a trap came for us, and we drove back to Hüferschingen.

Tita clapped her hands with delight; for Charlie was a favourite of hers, and now he was returning like a hero, with a sprig of fir in his cap to show that he had killed a buck.

"And here, Miss Franziska," he says, quite gaily, "here is a yellow fox for you. I was told that you wanted the skin of one."

Franziska fairly blushed for pleasure; not that the skin of a fox was very valuable to her, but that the compliment was so open and marked. She came forward, in German fashion, and rather shyly shook hands with him, in token of her thanks.

When Tita was getting ready for dinner I told her about the yellow fox. A married man must have no secrets.

"He is not capable of such a thing," she says, with a grand air.

"But he did it," I point out. "What is more, he glories in it. What did he say when I remonstrated with him on the way home? 'Why,' says he, 'I will put an end to Krumm! I will abolish Krumm! I will extinguish Krumm!' Now, Madam, who is responsible for this? Who has been praising Franziska night and day as the sweetest, gentlest, cleverest girl in the world, until this young man determines to have a flirtation with her and astonish you?"

"A flirtation!" says Tita, faintly. "Oh, no! Oh! I never meant that."

"Ask him just now, and he will tell you that women deserve no better. They have no hearts. They are treacherous. They have beautiful eyes, but no conscience. And so he means to take them as they are, and have his measure of amusement."

"Oh! I am sure he never said anything so abominably wicked," cries Tita, laying down the rose that Franziska had given her for her hair. "I know he could not say such things. But if he is so wicked—if he has said them—it is not too late to interfere. I will see about it."

She drew herself up as if Jupiter had suddenly armed her with his thunderbolts. If Charlie had seen her at this moment he would have quailed. He might, by chance, have told the truth, and confessed that all the wicked things he had been saying about women's affection were only a sort of rhetoric; and that he had no sort of intention to flirt with poor Franziska, nor yet to extinguish and annihilate Dr. Krumm.

The heartbroken boy was in very good spirits at dinner. He was inclined to wink. Tita, on the contrary, maintained an impressive dignity of demeanour; and when Franziska's name happened to be mentioned she spoke of the young girl as her very particular friend, as though she would dare Charlie to attempt a flirtation with one who held that honour. But the young man was either blind or reckless, or acting a part for mere mischief. He pointed the finger of scorn at Dr. Krumm. He asked Tita if he should bring her a yellow fox next day. He declared he wished he could spend the remainder of his days in a Black Forest inn, with a napkin over his arm, serving chopins. He said he would brave the wrath of the Fürst by shooting a capercaillie on the very first opportunity, to bring the shining feathers home to Franziska.

When Tita and I went up stairs at night the small and gentle creature was grievously perplexed.

"I cannot make it out," she said. "He is quite changed. What is the matter with him?"

"You behold, Madam, in that young man the moral effects of vulpicide. A demon has entered into him. You remember, in 'Der Freischütz,' how?"

"Did you say vulpicide?" she asks, with a sweet smile. "I understood that Charlie's crime was that he did not kill the fox."

I allow her the momentary triumph. Who would grudge to a woman a little verbal victory of that sort? And, indeed, Tita's satisfaction did not last long. Her perplexity became visible on her face once more.

"We are to be here three weeks," she said, almost to herself, "and he talks of flirting with poor Franziska. Oh! I never meant that."

"But what did you mean?" I ask, with some innocent wonder.

Tita hangs down her head, and there is an end to that conversation; but one of us, at least, has some recollection of a Christmas wager.

CHAPTER IV.

CONFESSIO AMANTIS.

Charlie was not in such good spirits next morning. He was standing outside the inn in the sweet, resinous-scented air, watching Franziska coming and going, with her bright face touched by the early sunlight, and her frank and honest eyes lit up by a kindly look when she passed us. His conscience began to smite him for claiming that fox.

We spent the day in fishing a stream some few miles distant from Hüferschingen; and Franziska accompanied us. What need to tell of our success with the trout and the grayling, or of the beautiful weather, or of the attentive and humble manner in which the unfortunate youth addressed Franziska from time to time?

In the evening we drove back to Hüferschingen. It was a still, beautiful evening, with the silence of the twilight falling over the lonely valleys, and the miles upon miles of darkening pines. Charlie has not much of a voice, but he made an effort to sing with Tita.

The winds whistle cold and the stars glimmer red,
The sheep are in fold and the cattle in shed; and the fine old glees sounded fairly well as we drove through the gathering gloom of the forest. But Tita sang, in her low sweet, fashion, that Swedish bridal song, that begins,

O welcome her so fair, with bright and flowing hair,
May Fate through life befriend her—love and smiles attend her:

and though she sang quietly, just as if she were singing to herself, we all listened with a great attention, and with great gratitude, too. When we got to Hüferschingen, the stars were out over the dark stretches of the forest, and the windows of the quaint old inn were burning brightly.

"And have you enjoyed the amusement of the day?" says Miss Fahler, rather shyly, to a certain young man who is emptying his creel of fish. He drops the basket to turn round, and look at her face, and say earnestly,

"I have never spent so delightful a day. But it wasn't the fishing." Things were becoming serious.

And next morning Charlie got hold of Tita, and said to her, in rather a shamefaced way,

"What am I to do about that fox? It was only a joke, you know; but if Miss Fahler gets to hear of it, she'll think it was rather shabby."

It was always Miss Fahler now; a couple of days before, it was Franziska.

"For my part," says Tita, "I can't understand why you did it. What honour is there in shooting a fox?"

"But I wanted to give the skin to her."

It was "her" by this time.

"Well, I think the best thing you can do is to go and tell her all about it; and also to go and apologise to Dr. Krumm."

Charlie started.

"I will go and tell her, certainly; but as for apologising to Krumm, that is absurd!"

"As you please," says Tita.

By-and-by Franziska—or, rather, Miss Fahler—came out of the small garden and round by the front of the house.

"Oh! Miss Fahler," says Charlie, suddenly, and with that she stops, and blushes slightly. "I've got something to say to you. I am going to make a confession. Don't be frightened;

it's only about a fox. The fox that was brought home the day before yesterday, Dr. Krumm shot that."

"Indeed," says Franziska, quite innocently, "I thought you shot it."

"Well, I let them imagine so. It was only a joke."

"But it is of no matter; there are many yellow foxes. Dr. Krumm can shoot them at another time. He is always here. Perhaps you will shoot one before you go."

With that Franziska passed into the house, carrying her fruit with her. Charlie was left to revolve her words in his mind. Dr. Krumm could shoot foxes when he chose; he was always here. He, Charlie, on the contrary, had to go in little more than a fortnight. There was no Franziska in England—no pleasant driving through great pine woods in the gathering twilight—no shooting of yellow foxes, to be brought home in triumph and presented to a beautiful and grateful young woman. Charlie walked along the white road, and overtook Tita, who had just sat down on a little camp-stool, and got out the materials for taking a water-colour sketch of the Hüferschingen valley. He sat down at her feet, on the warm grass.

"I suppose I shan't interrupt your painting by talking to you?" he says.

"Oh! dear, no," is the reply; and then he begins, in a somewhat hesitating way, to ask indirect questions, and drop hints, and fish for answers, just as if this small creature, who was busy with her sepias and olive-greens, did not see through all this transparent cunning. At last she said to him, frankly,

"You want me to tell you whether Franziska would make a good wife for you. She would make a good wife for any man. But then you seem to think that I should intermeddle, and negotiate, and become a go-between. How can I do that? My husband is always accusing me of trying to make up matches; and you know that isn't true."

"I know it isn't true," says the hypocrite. "But you might only this once. I believe all you say about this girl—I can see it for myself; and when shall I ever have such a chance again?"

"But, dear me!" says Tita, putting down the white pallet for a moment, "how can I believe you are in earnest? You have only known her three days."

"And that is quite enough," says Charlie, boldly, "to let you find out all you want to know about a girl, if she is of the right sort. If she isn't, you won't find out in three years. Now, look at Franziska. Look at the fine, intelligent face and the honest eyes; you can have no doubt about her; and then I have all the guarantee of your long acquaintance with her."

"Oh," says Tita, "that is all very well. Franziska is an excellent girl, as I have told you often—frank, kind, well-educated, and unselfish. But you cannot have fallen in love with her in three days?"

"Why not?" says this blunt-spoken young man.

"Because it is ridiculous. If I meddle in the affair I should probably find you had given up the fancy in other three days; or, if you did marry her and took her to England, you would get to hate me because I alone should know that you had married the niece of an innkeeper."

"Well, I like that!" says he, with a flush in his face. "Do you think I should care two straws whether my friends knew I had married the niece of an innkeeper? I should show them Franziska. Wouldn't that be enough? An innkeeper's niece! I wish the world had more of 'em, if they're like Franziska."

"And besides," says Tita, "have you any notion as to how Franziska herself would probably take this mad proposal?"

"No," says the young man, humbly. "I wanted you to try and find out what she thought about me; and if, in time, something were said about this proposal, you might put in a word or two, you know, just to—give her an idea, you know, that you don't think it quite so mad, don't you know?"

"Give me your hand, Charlie," says Tita, with a sudden burst of kindness. "I'll do what I can for you; for I know she's a good girl, and she will make a good wife to the man who marries her."

You will observe that this promise was given by a lady who never, in any circumstances whatsoever, seeks to make up matches, who never speculates on possible combinations when she invites young people to her house in Surrey, and who is profoundly indignant, indeed, when such a charge is preferred against her. Had she not, on that former Christmas morning, repudiated with scorn the suggestion that Charlie might marry before another year had passed? Had she not, in her wild confidence, staked on a wager that assumption of authority in her household and out of it without which life would be a burden to her? Yet no sooner was the name of Franziska mentioned—and no sooner had she been reminded that Charlie was going with us to Hüferschingen—than the nimble little brain set to work. Oftentimes it has occurred to one dispassionate spectator of her ways that this same Tita resembled the small object which, thrown into a dish of some liquid chemical substance, suddenly produces a mass of crystals. The constituents of those beautiful combinations, you see, were there; but they wanted some little shock to hasten on the slow process of crystallisation. Now, in our social circle we have continually observed groups of young people floating about in an amorphous and chaotic fashion—good for nothing but dawdling through dances, and flirting and carelessly separating again; but if you dropped Tita among them, then you would see how rapidly this jelly-fish sort of existence was abolished—how the groups got broken up—and how the sharp, business-like relations of marriage were precipitated and made permanent. But would she own to it? Never! She once went and married her dearest friend to a Prussian officer; and now she declares he was a selfish fellow to carry off the girl in that way, and rates him soundly because he won't bring her to stay with us more than three months out of the twelve. There are some of us get quite enough of this Prussian occupation of our territory.

"Well," says Tita to this long English lad, who is lying sprawling on the grass, "I can safely tell you this, that Franziska likes you very well."

He suddenly jumps up and there is a great blush on his face.

"Has she said so?" he asks, eagerly.

"Oh, yes! in a way. She thinks you are good-natured. She likes the English, generally. She asked me if that ring you wear was an engaged ring."

These disconnected sentences were dropped with a tantalising slowness into Charlie's eager ears.

"I must go and tell her directly that it is not," said he; and he might probably have gone off at once had not Tita restrained him.

"You must be a great deal more cautious than that, if you wish to carry off Franziska some day or other. If you were to ask her to marry you now, she would flatly refuse you, and very properly; for how could the girl believe you were in earnest? But if you like, Charlie, I will say something to her that will give her a hint; and if she cares for you at all before you go away, she won't forget you. I wish I was as sure of you as I am of her."

"Oh! I can answer for myself," says the young man.

Tita was very happy and pleased all that day. There was an air of mystery and importance about her. I knew what it meant. I had seen it before. Alas! poor Charlie.

CHAPTER V.

"GAB MIR EIN' RING DABEI."

Under the friendly instructions of Dr. Krumm, whom he no longer regarded as a possible rival, Charlie became a mighty hunter; and you may be sure that when he returned of an evening, with sprigs of fir in his cap for the bucks he had slain, Franziska was not the last to come forward, and shake hands with him, and congratulate him, as is the custom in these primitive parts. And then she was quite made one of the family when we sat down to dinner in the long, low-roofed room; and nearly every evening, indeed, Tita would have her to dine with us and play cards with us. You may suppose, if these two young folk had any regard for each other, those evenings in the inn must have been a pleasant time for them. There never were two partners at whist who were so courteous to each other, so charitable to each other's blunders. Indeed, neither would ever admit that the other blundered. Charlie used to make some frightful mistakes occasionally that would have driven any other player mad; but you should have seen the manner in which Franziska would explain that he had no alternative but to take her king with his ace; that he could not know this, and was right in chancing that. We played threepenny points, and Charlie paid for himself and his partner, in spite of her entreaties. Two of us found the game of whist a profitable thing.

One day a registered letter came for Charlie. He seized it, carried it to a window, and then called Tita to him. Why need he have made any secret about it? It was nothing but a ring—a plain hoop with a row of rubies.

"Do you think she would take this thing?" he said, in a low voice.

"How can I tell?"

The young man blushed and stammered, and said, "I don't want you to ask her to take the ring, but to get to know whether she would accept any present from me. And I would ask her myself, plainly; only you have been frightening me so much about being in a hurry. And what am I to do? Three days hence we start."

Tita looks down with a quiet smile, and says, rather timidly, "I think, if I were you, I would speak to her myself—but very gently."

We were going off that morning to a little lake some dozen miles off, to try for a jack or two. Franziska was coming with us. She was, indeed, already outside, superintending the placing in the trap of our rods and bags. When Charlie went out she said that everything was ready; and presently our peasant-driver cracked his whip, and away we went.

Charlie was a little grave, and could only reply to Tita's fun with an effort. Franziska was mostly anxious about the fishing, and hoped that we might not go so far to find nothing.

We found few fish, anyhow. The water was as still as glass and as clear; the pike that would have taken our spinning bits of metal must have been very dull-eyed pike indeed. Tita sat at the bow of the long punt reading, while our boatman steadily and slowly plied his single oar. Franziska was for a time eagerly engaged in watching the progress of our fishing, until even she got tired of the excitement of rolling in an immense length of cord only to find that our spinning-bait had hooked a bit of floating wood or weed. At length Charlie proposed that he should go ashore and look out for a picturesque site for our picnic, and he hinted that perhaps Miss Franziska might also like a short walk, to relieve the monotony of this sailing. Miss Franziska said she would be very pleased to do that. We ran them in among the rushes, and put them ashore, and then once more started on our laborious career.

Tita laid down her book. She was a little anxious. Sometimes you could see Charlie and Franziska on the path by the side of the lake, at other times the thick trees by the water's side hid them.

The solitary oar dipped in the water; the boat glided along the shores. Tita took up her book again. The space of time that passed may be inferred from the fact that, merely as an incident to it, we managed to catch a chub of four pounds. When the excitement over this event had passed, Tita said,

"We must go back to them. What do they mean by not coming on and telling us? It is most silly of them."

We went back by the same side of the lake, and we found both Franziska and her companion seated on the bank at the precise spot where we had left them. They said it was the best place for the picnic. They asked for the hamper in a business-like way. They pretended they had searched the shores of the lake for miles.

And while Tita and Franziska are unpacking the things, and laying the white cloth smoothly on the grass, and putting out the bottles for Charlie to cool in the lake, I observe that the younger of the two ladies rather endeavours to keep her left hand out of sight. It is a paltry piece of deception. Are we moles, and blinder than moles, that we should continually be made the dupes of these women? I say to her,

"Franziska, what is the matter with your left hand?"

"Leave Franziska's left hand alone," says Tita, severely.

"My dear," I reply, humbly, "I am afraid Franziska has hurt her left hand."

At this moment Charlie, having stuck the bottles among the reeds, comes back, and, hearing our talk, he says, in a loud and audacious way,

"Oh! do you mean the ring? It is a pretty little thing I had about me, and Franziska has been good enough to accept it. You can show it to them, Franziska."

Of course he had it about him. Young men always do carry a stock of ruby rings with them when they go fishing, to put in the noses of the fish. I have observed it frequently.

Franziska looks timidly at Tita, and then she raises her hand, that trembles a little. (See Illustration.) She is about to take the ring off, to show it to us, when Charlie interposes,

"You needn't take it off, Franziska."

And with that, somehow, the girl slips away from among us; and Tita is with her, and we don't get a glimpse of either of them until the solitude resounds with our cries for luncheon.

Charlie returned to London, and to Surrey, with us, in very good spirits. He used to come down very often to see us; and one evening, at dinner, he disclosed the fact that he was going over to the Black Forest in the following week, although the November nights were chill just then.

"And how long do you remain?"

"A month," he says.

"Madam," I say to the small lady at the other end of the table, "a month from now will bring us to the Fourth of December. You have lost the bet you made last Christmas morning; when will it please you to resign your authority?"

"Oh, bother the bet!" says this unscrupulous person.

"But what do you mean?" says Charlie.

"I suppose you intend to bring Franziska over with you at the end of this month's holiday?" I venture to ask.

"Oh, no!" he says; "we don't get married till the Spring."

You should have heard the burst of low, delightful laughter with which our Tita welcomed this announcement. She had won her bet.

"Francis looks tingly at Tit, and then she raises her hand that trembles a little. She is about to take the ring off, to show it to us, when Clayton interposes."

"AMONG THE MANGROVES."—DRAWN BY V. W. BROMLEY.

AMONG THE MANGROVES.

BY CAPTAIN MAYNE REID,

AUTHOR OF "THE DEATH SHOT," ETC.

"I live on the south side of the island—beyond Batabano. Mia casa a disposicion de V."

Thus spoke to me a fellow-passenger on the Royal mail-steamer "Osprey," as we ran into the harbour of Havana.

He who had thus generously placed his house at my disposal was a native of the "ever-faithful island." But one who looked with no favouring eye on its fidelity being continued. On the contrary, he had a leaning towards "Cuba Libre."

"Mia casa a disposicion de V."

The phrase, often a mere formality, meaning nothing, I knew. But from Don Mariano Agüera, as I also knew, an invitation extended in sincerity and meant for acceptance.

Pressing it, he continued, "If you're fond of field sports I fancy I can treat you to some that may be new."

This said to a man in a shooting-coat with six pockets appertaining!

"Beyond that," pursued the Cuban, "and showing you some of our scenery, I can offer but little in the way of entertainment. I am a bachelor, living in a lonely 'bohio,' with a sister who keeps house for me—an untutored Creole girl, whose manners won't much remind you of the fashionable ladies of London and Paris. But I can answer for her having a warm heart, and making welcome the friend of her brother. Now, caballero! Say you will come."

The field sports had already inclined me to acceptance. At mention of the "untutored Creole girl" my mind was made up.

"Con mucho gusto" was the answer I gave Don Mariano.

"My sister," he said, in continuance, "is at present with our aunt, who lives a little way outside the city. After landing we shall run out there, pick her up, then on to Batabano."

The formidable duana done with, and our impedimenta placed in charge of a comisario, to be forwarded to the railway station, we leaped into a volante, and between its two huge wheels were soon jolting through the suburbs of Havana.

In less than half an hour we came in sight of a handsome country house, with flowered parterres in front, and a grand portaled entrance. A young lady was standing on the stoop, as if on the look out for some one expected. Then, as the carriage turned in, she ran towards it with arms outstretched, these soon after folding around my friend's neck, while his cheek was saluted with a shower of kisses that would have given pleasure to Sardanapalus.

I felt I was in the presence of my Fate. For my heart said, this is she, the ideal for whom I have been seeking, the woman whose wishes must rule mine, for happiness or misery, for good or for evil. Before me stood what seemed a very Venus; not like her of Cyprus, posed upon the shell, with tresses of that hue which the auricomous dye of modern days can so easily counterfeit; but Cytherea, as she should be in a southern clime, with the complexion becoming it—skin with a tinge of golden brown, cheeks carmine red, teeth like strings of pearls fished up out of her native seas, and hair—

Idle to attempt depicting the charms of Engracia Agüera.

We spent the remainder of the day, with the night following, under the roof of the tia; a hospitable old lady of the brocaded type, who carried a bunch of keys à la châtelaine.

Next morning we were driven to the railway terminus at Havana; and there booking for Batabano, were soon gliding along the camino de hierro amidst scenes which made it worth while keeping the curtains drawn aside.

In a native of the north a railway running through tropical scenery gives rise to thoughts savouring of the grotesque. Steam, the symbol of modern civilisation, appears altogether out of place among palm-trees. And, as its smoke curls up through their feathery fronds, one cannot help an idea of something like desecration. The iron horse gallops on through thick primeval forest, the steam from its nostrils ascending among the branches of magnificent fig-trees, cedrelas, and caobas. At times the carriage is obscured, as if the train were passing through a tunnel. Looking out you behold huge trunks, each with its array of parasitical plants roped together like the rigging of a ship. Many are splendid orchids, with flowers fully expanded; often hanging so close to the carriage windows that you may hook them with the handle of your umbrella, or, stretching forth your arm, gather nosegays that in Covent-garden would command a fabulous price.

Batabano was at length reached—the terminus station.

We made short stay in the town. Don Mariano had taken the precaution to send on instructions the day before; hence a vehicle for our baggage, with saddle-horses, awaiting us.

Mounting, we rode away, and were once more amid the wildest wood scenery—a virgin forest, scarce defiled by the stroke of the woodman's axe—the path we were pursuing arched over with palms whose smooth trunks looked like the supporting columns of some grand temple, their curved leaves forming the concavity of its dome, fancifully frescoed.

At intervals the forest flashed open, and we caught glimpses of the sea, and its shore—bits of beach, with sand that looked like silver filings mixed with the dust of gold, strewn with shells showing all the incandescence of the opal. There were corals, red like Engracia's lips; bivalves of pearly hue, blanched to the whiteness of her teeth. Then the path would plunge suddenly into shadow, dark as her hair, with fire-flies—great cocuyos—flitting about, to symbolize the glances of her eyes.

At length a house came in sight—the dwelling-place of Don Mariano. Not a humble hut—a bohio, as he had modestly characterised it—but a mansion of imposing appearance, with grand gate entrance and avenue leading up, the latter bordered by double rows of the palma real.

I saw that it was a coffee plantation of the first class, with hundreds of slaves at work in the fields.

Six days spent as in Paradise. Shooting excursions through the tropical forest, and along the shell-strewn shores of the beautiful Caribbean. These, varied by rides around the cafetal, accompanied by its owner, eloquent on the qualities of his crop. More pleasantly varied by strolls afoot with a fair companion—his sister—under the shade of orange-trees and corozo palms. There listening to the cooing of doves, the song of the Cuban nightingale, and the cries of the red cardinal; to something still sweeter—the voice of Engracia Agüera.

Never so sweet as on that sixth day, and when we two were straying through a copse of caimitos. I was now in love with her to the deepest depths of my soul—a passion that, unreciprocated, would consume me. And I intended to declare it, in the face of all apprehension for the issue. Soon I must return to Havana. Was I to go back happy, or bearing a broken heart? I must know.

The hour seemed propitious; and just then there chanced a circumstance that looked like the foreshadowing of a happy fate. From our path sprang two palominas, the beautiful little Cuban doves—very mannikins among the Columbidae. They flew only a short distance; then settled down on a branch, where they sat side by side, close together, cooing and kissing. They did not seem at all scared at our intrusion, nor attempt to flit further away; but continued their caresses till we came up, almost near enough to touch them. They appeared to know that we, too, were wooing.

We stopped, and stood gazing at the pretty love birds, types of the fondest, purest affection.

"You see those doves, Señorita?" I asked. "Have you any thought concerning them?"

"Have you?"

"Yes. I should like to be one of them."

"What a singular fancy—to wish yourself a palomita!"

"Only on condition of somebody being another."

"Who?"

"The Doña Engracia Agüera."

Not receiving response from her whose cheek flushed red, I continued, in resolute interrogative. It was not the time to talk in enigmas.

"Engracia, tu me quieres?"

"Yo te quiero," came the answer, equally without reserve.

Then were our hands joined; the flushed cheek fell over on my breast, permitting me to press lips sweeter than the honey of Hybla!

The seventh day of my sojourn at the cafetal was to be the last; business I had too long neglected necessitating my return to Havana. On that day I would have preferred leaving field sports alone; but my host tempted me with an offer to go flamingo-shooting.

We were about setting forth, when a man rode up to the house; and, drawing Don Mariano aside, engaged him in conversation. Though in a low tone, it was of an earnest nature, as I could tell by their excited looks and gestures; and, their dialogue ended, the horseman went away as he had come. Then Don Mariano, rejoining me, said,

"Señor; I am very sorry I shall not be able to go with you. A summons, unexpected, calls me elsewhere; but do not let it interfere with your day's sport. Gaspardo will guide you to the shooting-ground of the flamingoes; and you can slaughter them to your heart's content without any help from me. I shall be back in good time to join you at the dinner-table. So now Adios! Hasta la tarde."

Saying this, he sprang to his saddle, and rode hastily off.

The change of programme, with my host's abrupt departure, did not seem to me at all extraordinary. I could even conjecture its cause. It was not the first time I had seen strangers at the house, coming and going hurriedly. What should it be but "Cuba Libre?"

Therefore of his seemingly eccentric behaviour I thought no more that morning than any other. Only as he went away something whispered me that there was danger drawing nigh, an electricity in the moral atmosphere of the "ever faithful island" that would soon burst over it in a terrible storm; its lightning to be the flames of burning houses, its thunder the roaring of cannon, and its rain red blood.

Seized by an uncomfortable feeling I could not account for, I had lost all ardour for sport, and hesitated about proceeding upon it. To stay at home promised pastime more attractive.

Then it occurred to me that Don Mariano might think strange of my remaining at the house in his absence; more especially after having seen me on horseback ready to start out. He was not yet aware of the tender relations established between his sister and myself.

The sentiment of delicacy decided me; and, giving heel to my horse, I set forward, Gaspardo guiding me.

An original was this Gaspardo, worthy a word of description. No common slave, but the "cazador" of the plantation, having in his veins at least three distinct strains of blood—European, Ethiopian, and Indian—with a dash of the devil to give spice to the compound. For all, a good fellow at bottom, fearing God after a fashion, but without the slightest fear of man. Of his courage and prowess I had proofs.

On the way we caught sight of a horseman riding in the same direction as ourselves. We did not overtake him. Before we could come up, he sheered off into a side path, and was almost instantly out of sight.

A singular personage, judging from the slight glance I got of him; stylishly dressed in an embroidered jacket of velvet, and trousers of the same, slashed along the seams, with a scarf of scarlet crape wound around the waist, its ends hanging down over his hips. Beside them a sword, its scabbard tip clinking against spurs that sparkled upon his heels. On his back a short gun, carried à la bandolière, and in one hand a guitar.

All this I saw at a glance; the same taking in his features, as, turning out of the road, he looked back. They were not such as to give a good impression of him, but the contrary.

"Who is he, Gaspardo?"

"Only a goajiro."

"A goajiro? What is that?"

"A fellow who drinks all day and dances all night; yet don't own anything but the clothes on his back, and the animal between his legs; often not so much, if everybody had their due. Sometimes both horse and saddle are stolen; which is likely enough with him who has just slipped out of sight. I'd lay a wager Rafael Carrasco never came by that andante in an honest way."

"Rafael Carrasco, you call him?"

"Si, Señor; and a bigger rascal isn't to be met with around Batabano. Don Rafael, he styles himself, with the conceit of Don the Devil. He used to come swaggering about our place, till master forbade him."

"Why did he forbid him?"

"Caballero; if you promise not to betray confidence."

"I promise it. You may speak without fear."

"Well, then, it was because Carrasco had the impudence—only think of it!—to make pretension to the Señorita."

"Indeed!" I was deeply interested now.

"In what way?" I asked. "Tell me the particulars."

"Well, Señor; once at a fiesta we had, he was called upon for a song. I will say that, scoundrel though he be, he can sing well, and plays the guitar to perfection. Most goajiros can do that; and make their own songs, too, if they don't the tunes. So, what does my gentleman sing but some verses he composed himself, or said he had, in praise of the Señorita, describing her charms, as people said, too freely; then winding up with words to say how much he admired her. It was all up with him after that. Don Mariano was very angry about it; and told him never to come near the house again."

"Was the Señorita herself angry?"

With an effort to conceal my emotion, I awaited the answer. "Ah, caballero! That I can't tell. Women are such queer creatures. There are not many of them who don't like being praised, especially in poetry. Be sure the best of them can stomach a good deal of that. There was the Doña Eusebia Gomez, the daughter of one of our grandees, who went away with a goajiro, and actually got married to him. All because he sang canciones, praising her beauty and bright eyes, and that sort of thing. Oh, yes; in their vanity the muchachas are much the same—whether they be poor girls or rich ladies."

I confess Gaspardo's ungallant sentiments caused me pain, suggesting thoughts I ought not to have entertained. Something more than mere curiosity piqued me to question further.

"I presume Master Carrasco has by this time relinquished his aspirations?"

"Quien sabe, Señor? For that matter, he might as well. Such as he to think of matching with a grand lady like the Doña Engracia Agüera! It would be as modest in me aspiring to be the alcalde-mayor of Batabano. For all that, one can tell what Rafael Carrasco may be up to. He's got brass enough for anything, and, besides, the deceit of Satan himself. I don't believe there's a greater picaro along all this coast; and, report speaks true, he's in secret league with contrabandists, slave-dealers, and all such sorts. Only last week one of the people saw him in the company of El Cocodrilo."

"El Cocodrilo! Who may he be?"

"What! You don't know El Cocodrilo?"

"Indeed, I don't."

"Well, I'll tell you. He's a runaway slave—a black man, once belonged to my master. As he was a bad sort, Don Mariano sold him to another planter—a neighbour—from whom he was after absconded. That was several years ago; and ever since he has been a cimmaron—not one of them able to catch. Yet he gives them every chance, as you might think. There isn't a week passes without his being heard of on some of the plantations, making love to the negro wenches, and robbing their masters right and left. Several times they've got hunting parties, and set the hounds upon his trail—their bloodhounds. Still, he continues to baffle them all."

"He must be a clever scamp. But why is he called Cocodrilo?"

"Ah! that's partly on account of his being pockpitted, which, as you see, makes his skin a little like that of the cayman and crocodiles; besides, he's a big, ungainly fellow, as they say. But I think he's got the name more from his hiding in the cienega, where these animals have their haunts. By-the-way, Señor, this is the very swamp where they say he secretes himself. It is called La Zapata, and extends ever so far along the shore. I'd just like to set eyes upon his ugly image. I myself some scores to settle with the cimmaron."

We reached the roosting-place of the flamingoes, and, half apprehended, found no birds. Their season of breeding was past, and they were absent, no doubt, on some of the part of the shore, where shell-fish and the small fry on which they feed were more plentiful. I saw scores of their curved nests, truncated cones, on which they sit, or rather stand, their long legs straddled, during the period of incubation. They were empty now, but around lay the shells of their hatchlings, and feathers cast at moulting. I observed much less than should have interested me, had I been in the humour of ornithological inquiry. But I was not. The fear felt in the morning was still upon me—a shadow over my spirits I could not shake off.

While returning along the swamp edge the cazador parted company with me. He begged permission, on the part of paying a visit to some one who had his dwelling near. As I now knew the way, there was no longer need for his guidance. So we parted with a mutual "Hasta, luego!" as in on Gaspardo calling after me, "¡a con Dios!"

I had barely lost sight of him, his voice yet ringing in my ear when another sound saluted them. At first I fancied it to be the sigh of the sea. But the noise heard was softer, and more smoothly resonant. Besides, it came from above.

Turning my eyes upward, I saw what was causing it. The blue sky was enamelled with scarlet spots—great birds with their wings extended in flight—the flamingoes.

They were right overhead, and at least one hundred yards vertically distant. But my breech-loader was charged, and, as I now knew the way, there was no longer need for his guidance. So we parted with a mutual "Hasta, luego!" as in on Gaspardo calling after me, "¡a con Dios!"

The flamingo fell among the mangroves; and, having carefully marked it down, I slipped out of the saddle, tied my horse to a tree, and started to retrieve it.

Entering among the trees, I commenced climbing over the aerial roots.

Clutching the stems, and springing from root to root, I kept on in hopes of soon clutching my prize. In this I was disappointed; though it was quite an accident my again getting sight of it. For soon after entering the thicket I lost bearings of the place where I had seen it settle down. Scarcely which I presumed to proceed from its throat, guided me to the spot. Instead, they proved to be the cries of the curucú eagle; two of which were in the act of quarrelling over a quail they had not killed. The flamingo was quite dead, lying with its wings extended, like a scarlet shawl spread over the branches, its long neck, weighted with the huge curving mandible, dangling down beneath the body.

Carefully packing it for transport, I commenced returning on my tracks.

Tracks! There were none.

In less than five minutes after bagging the bird I was wandering amid a maze, as hopeless of finding my way as the royal lover to reach Fair Rosamond without the silken clue.

I did not at first fully realise the seriousness of the situation. But doing so, I came to a pause, with that dead heaviness at the heart one feels on becoming sensible that he has strayed and got lost—not on a common highway, or amid fields of corn, but in the shadow of a trackless forest, or the open expanse of a pathless prairie.

As the fell fear crept over me, I called out loud enough to frighten the caracaras. I got no response, save their screams, that, resounding through the swamp, resembled the laughter of maniacs. They seemed mocking me!

Despair now possessed me. I had made every effort to reach terra-firma—first tacking one way, then another, as appearances promised better—like a sloth, swinging myself from branch to branch and root to root. At length I came upon a place where the bark showed abrasions. These, on scrutiny, proved to have been made by my shooting-boots. I had returned on my own tracks!

For several hours I kept clambering about; till the increasing gloom under the leafy canopy warned me that night was nigh.

Just then a dark object attracted my attention, and I started towards it. Drawing nearer, I saw what looked like a haystack set upon piles. I discovered it to be a shed; evidently no freak of vegetable nature, but the work of human hands. Nearer still, beheld a platform of bamboos, warped and twined among the tree-roots; above, a thatch of leaves, the broad blades of the wild banana. Three sides were inclosed with a wattle of sipos; the fourth open, giving admission to the interior.

Springing up to the wicker stage, I found myself amid objects that told of human occupation, though the occupant was not at home. There was a hammock swung between two stems, and a bamboo bedstead. From the roof hung strings of chili peppers, onions, and clusters of ripe plantains; while in one corner stood a basket of sweet potatoes, and a second containing oranges, mangoes, cherimoyas, alligator pears, and a variety of other fruit—a cornucopia of tropical products.

Suspended from a limb outside was a huge guana lizard, skinned, disembowelled, ready for the spit. That it could be broiled there was evident, from the embers of a fire that smouldered on a mud hearth in the centre of the staging.

I had no need to conjecture what all this meant. Soon as seeing the hut so strangely situated, I could tell it to be the refuge of some runaway slave—the home of a hunted maroon.

And who other could its owner be than the dreaded Cocodrilo? I was as sure of this as if I had met the pock-marked man by his own hearth, and been invited to partake of his hospitality.

Vividly recalling his character, as Gaspardo had given it, I had no desire to make his acquaintance. Under the circumstances, an interview with him might not end amicably.

With my eyes on the saurian suspended outside—its form fearfully suggestive of a human being hanged and flayed—I remained not an instant longer under the roof of the runaway.

I had now better hopes of being able to regain the shore. For, although the daylight was nearly gone, still, in the dim twilight I could distinguish something like a path along the tangle of roots. Whitish blotches showed where their bark had been trodden off by the hard, horny soles of a negro's feet.

Along this I started, continuing on for several hundred yards. Then the night came down dark as a pot of pitch, and I could no more make out the marks. To proceed farther would only be to get strayed again—perhaps with less chance of ultimate escape. Fearing this, I desisted from further attempts, and resolved to stay among the mangroves till morning.

To make myself comfortable, as circumstances would permit, I selected a spot where the roots were thickly matted; and there laid myself along like a steak upon a gridiron. But, before courting sleep, I took the precaution to buckle my pouch-belt around a branch, at the same time attaching it to my body. Otherwise I might roll over into the mud, and furnish the caymans with a midnight meal.

The position was irksome enough—to say nothing of being stung by the mosquitoes that swarmed in myriads around me. A mangrove swamp is the place to find these noxious insects in their most venomous vigour.

But the fatigue consequent on over two hours of constant tree-climbing, along with a strain of mental anxiety throughout all the day, at length overcame me; and I yielded to inevitable slumber.

How long I was unconscious I could not tell till afterwards. Then, on taking stock of time, I knew it must have been about an hour. During it I was the prey to horrid dreams, and had fearful visions presented to my slumbering senses. In these figured my host, Don Mariano Agüera, and his fair sister, now almost my fiancée; she like an angel, with a luminous aureole over her brow, but beneath a countenance seeming distressed and sad. Beside her were two devils; one splendidly apparelled, with the look of Lucifer; the other bigger and blacker, a sort of Vulcan, with skin charred and spotted as by sparks from his Tartarean forge. Of course my fancy of the first must have come from what I had seen of the goajiro; the second suggested by Gaspardo's description of "El Cocodrilo." Beside these two demons-in-chief were lesser ones, their satellites. The young girl appeared to be threatened and in peril. I could hear her crying out; by name calling me to come to her rescue!

And I felt that I could not. I was fast bound, unable to stir hand or foot. Still, I struggled; and this, with her continuing cries, awoke me.

Certainly I was bound, as I knew on awaking—buckled to the branch of a tree. In that there was no imagination, nor in the cries neither; only that these came not from Engracia Agüera, but from the qua-bird—a species of bittern, which frequents the ciénegas of Cuba.

Released from the spell of my dream, but not recovered from its unpleasantness, I lay listening. For the scream of the night bird had something in it different from its ordinary call.

Soon it gave note again—clearly a signal of alarm!

But now I no longer listened to it. Other sounds, of greater significance, engrossed my attention—beyond doubt, human voices! There was also a scratching among the trees, with the swish of bent branches in rebound.

"El Cocodrilo returning to his lair, accompanied by a confederate!" This was my supposition.

The moon had meanwhile arisen, lighting up open spaces among the mangroves. One of these was close to where I sat; for I had now unbuckled the belt, and raised myself to a sitting posture. And where the white rays slanted down, I saw two dark forms. Human shapes both, however devilish their doings. For it was evident they were at something "uncanny."

Clambering over the tangle of roots, they bore a burden between them. It was a thing of oblong shape, that might be a coffin or a corpse—looking more like the latter. (See Illustration.)

"Some piece of plunder which the Crocodile is dragging to his lair, so heavy as to need help—some delicate article, easily damaged or broken?"

While thus conjecturing, they advanced within less than ten paces of where I sat. Then I saw their forms more distinctly, while for a moment the moonlight, shining through a break in the foliage, fell upon their faces. Of these I caught only a glimpse; but enough almost to make me imagine I was still asleep and dreaming! For the faces were exactly those that had figured in the phantasmagoria just disturbed—the two chief demons!

Engrossed in the endeavour to identify them, I took no note of anything else, till they were nearly out of sight. Then, glancing between, I saw what startled me, causing my heart to beat double quick, while the blood ran cold in my veins. Something whitish, draped down below. It looked like a light-colored shawl, or the skirt of a woman's dress.

Was it a woman they were carrying? And, if so, was she living? Or a corpse, and the white drapery its shroud—its winding-sheet?

I had an impulse to stalk after them, and see. It was more than mere curiosity. Indeed, a very different sentiment, as I recalled the scenes that had afflicted me in my dream. Could it be possible that any of the other personages who had appeared—that she—Engracia Agüera—

No—no! The supposition was absurd—too improbable. But for the excited state I was in, I should not have entertained it for an instant.

And scarce did I; returning to my former belief, that the runaway and his confederate were engaged in the ultimate act of a burglary—about to secrete the stolen goods. Or it might be a bit of contraband. By Gaspardo's account of the goajiro, the latter seemed the more probable.

On reflection, I concluded to leave the smugglers to themselves—at least for that night. Chance had conducted me to their hiding-place. If house property had been abstracted, I should know where it was stored, and could take steps for recovering it.

With the moon now shining clear, I fancied I might find my way out of the mangrove swamp. All the easier, from having noted the direction by which the two men had approached me, coming from the land side.

I was about setting forth to find their track, when something of a different sort promised to give me guidance.

Chancing to look upwards, I beheld an illuminated spot in the sky. It was not the moon, nor any of her satellite stars. But a light of reddish yellow hue—easily distinguishable as the glare of a conflagration!

Not likely that this would be in the midst of the mangroves; and less on the sea outside them. The fire, whatever it was, must be inland.

Taking its gleam for my guiding star, I started off afresh. Soon, reaching the edge of the mangrove thicket, I sprang from the network of roots, and once more stood on solid earth.

Scanning around, I saw I had come out on known ground—the very spot where I had fired at the flamingo. Near by was the tree to which I had tied my horse; and, entering under its shadow, I found the animal still there, as I had left him; only, like myself, terribly tormented by the mosquitoes.

A soft whimper expressed his delight at my reappearance.

Snatching the bridle from the branch, then flinging the reins over his neck, I vaulted into the saddle. Knowing the way well, in the clear moonlight I could not again get strayed.

In less than twenty minutes after, I rode through the gate of the cafetal, and was heading up to the house.

No, not to the house. There was none there now; only the walls of one, with its roof ablaze, flames spurring out, and sparks ascending to the sky!

Looking along the avenue between the rows of royal palms, I saw the space at the further end lit up as in daylight—only with the red light of a roaring conflagration.

I did not need telling that the torch of the incendiary had been at work. Instinctively I knew it, with a boding of misfortune far worse than fire. My own heart felt aflame, as I struck my heels against my horse's flanks, and galloped on.

As I drew near, I could see people flitting about; men and women, their dark forms outlined, en silhouette, against the blazing background. I could hear their shouts and ejaculations—all in tones of terror or distress.

In a moment more I was in their midst, scrutinising their faces in search of two that were white—the master of the burning mansion, and its mistress.

No white faces there; only black, brown, and yellow—the slaves and retainers of the plantation.

A man rushing up halted by my horse's head. In the fire glare I recognised Gaspardo. Without waiting to hear what he had to say, I inquired,

"Where are they—Don Mariano—Doña Engracia?"

"Gone; both gone! Oh, Señor! isn't it sad?"

"Gone! Whither? The fire! What does it all mean? Tell me. Quick—quick!"

"Por Dios, caballero! I cannot. I do not know myself. I got home but half an hour ago. Then I found things as you see; only that the fire wasn't so great. We tried to stop it, but couldn't; the old house will have to go."

"Who has done it?" I mechanically asked. Something whispered me that I knew the man.

"Well; the people say that soldiers came here from Batabano—to arrest the master, because of his being one of the patriotas. By good luck he's got away, and they had to go back without him. Then later, after it was night, some others came that weren't soldiers at all, but men in masks. It was they who've carried off the Señorita and set fire to the casa grande. It's been burning ever since; and she—pohrecita! Nobody knows where they've taken, or what's being done to her."

I knew the first; of the last ignorant, though tortured with a terrible apprehension. I had no doubt that the thing carried between the two robbers was Engracia Agüera.

Was she still living? Or had they killed her, and was what I had seen but her corpse?

"O God! O God!" I groaned in agony, as the fell fear swept through my soul.

"Gaspardo! you are brave; you would risk your life to save that of the niña—would you not?"

"Ten times over; only tell me how. Try me, Señor; you shall see."

"Get your gun and horse."

"They are there."

He pointed to the horse, that stood tied to a rail.

"Mount, then, and follow me! Lose not a moment!"

The cazador sprang to his saddle. I had not forsaken mine; and we rode off, leaving the red flames behind us.

We went straight for the swamp La Zapata.

In less than twenty minutes after, we were upon its edge. Dismounting, we made our horses secure, tying them to the same tree under which mine had passed the afternoon and evening. We muffled them, to prevent their neighing. The work we had before us called for caution, silence, the stealthy tread of tigers.

On the way I had told Gaspardo what had happened to me, and communicated my plan of action; which he approved.

We were going to engage in a conflict with two men strong as ourselves; to recover a captive they were not likely to relinquish without a struggle. On both sides it would be for life, hand to hand, and necessarily desperate. My companion knew this, but quailed not. He was game to the backbone, almost as eager as I to enter upon action.

I had therefore no uneasiness about his flinching, or failing me.

My only fear was not being able to get face to face with the enemy. Would it be possible to retrace my steps to the hiding-place of the maroon? This was the question that gave me most concern; less now that the cazador was by my side. After I had told him all he made light of the difficulty, and seemed sure of finding the way. He spoke as if acquainted with it. In my zigzag wanderings through the tangle I had observed a tree taller than those around it—not a mangrove, though growing among them. It was close to the shieling of the runaway. I had made special note of this, with some vague anticipation it might afterwards stand me in stead, if I should need it for a landmark. The need had come sooner than expected. It was now.

"I know that tree well," said the hunter. "It's a mahagua, that's grown from a seed some bird has dropped among the mangroves. I remember having shot a bird upon it—a big, harpy eagle, that perched on its branches. If that's the place I can go straight to it, though it's many years since I shot the harpy. Not much matter about the tree, either, if you can only put me on the path you speak of. Where a man has scrambled over these roots trust me for finding his tracks, even if it's only moonlight. Have no fear, caballero! Proceed, and show me the place where you came out of the swamp."

Soon as I had set him on the track, he took the lead, leaving me to follow.

We went well for some three hundred yards, when, in spite of the cazador's wonderful skill, we were compelled to pause. The moon had suddenly dipped under a cloud, hiding blotches on the bark. It was maddening to be thus baffled. Every moment was fraught with fearful consequences. My fancy pictured Engracia, as she had appeared in my dream, struggling to escape from the embrace of the fiendish brutes! Oh! that she could have called out; for now I might have heard, and her cries guided me to the spot where she had been carried.

We listened, but could hear no sound of human voice—only the noises of the night, such as meet the ear in the midst of a mangrove-swamp. Horrid sounds: the groan of the great Southern owl, the wailing cries of the qua-bird, the "gluck-gluck" of the gigantic bull-frog, and the bellowing of alligators. All sounds consonant with our situation—seeming to mock me in my misery. For I was now wretched—despairing—in the belief that, after all, we should be beaten, and have to go back, leaving the captive unrescued. And the thought of such captivity! It was too fearful to bear reflection.

I turned to my companion, in the hope of hearing some word to cheer me. But, no! He only whispered,

"There's no help for it, caballero. We must wait till that cloud drives past. If we attempt to go on without—Ha! what's that—yonder? A light? Carramba! I hope it isn't the Farol de Diablo!"

I looked in the direction pointed out. Sure enough there was a light gleaming through the trees. But, as I could tell by the red glare, it came from a real fire, and not an ignus fatuus, as Gaspardo meant, calling it the "Devil's Lamp."

Gazing at the gleam, we became satisfied as to its true character; and, soon as resolved, stole on towards it.

Gliding silently, we got within less than twelve paces of the spot; there stopping to reconnoitre—rather to take breath for the final spring, now near. For by this we understood all, and knew to a certainty what was before us.

It was the shed of the fugitive slave.

We had approached it by its open side, and could see everything within.

A fire freshly kindled was burning on the hearth; beside which crouched El Cocodrilo himself. He had the iguana in his grasp, and was about impaling it on the spit. Evidently the reptile was to be the pièce de résistance of their supper.

On the bamboo bedstead were two forms, seated side by side—one erect, the other drooping. The upright figure was that of the goajiro; the bent one, Engracia Agüera. I could see that her hair hung dishevelled, and that her dress was torn to shreds. Also, that her countenance was sad—the cheeks wan, the lips pallid, the eyes streaming tears!

I was with difficulty I restrained myself from springing forward, and at once effecting her rescue.

Prudence kept me back—an intuitive perception that her peril was for the time past, but might return by my acting inconsiderately.

We were still some distance from the stage, where the last scene of the drama would need to be enacted—beyond the bounds of a single spring. We must get nearer before attempting to enter upon the denouement.

While stealing closer, striding from root to root, Gaspardo by my side, both silent as ocelots approaching their prey, I heard the speech,

"So, fair lady! What think you of things now? Aha! Doña Engracia Agüera! I have you in my power, and mean to keep you so—as the cayman keeps the prey he has clutched. To-night you and I shall repose on the same couch!"

"No!" I cried, bounding upon the platform, unable any longer to hold back.

Then, grasping the throat of the ruffian, Gaspardo simultaneously tackling the runaway, I continued,

"Surrender, Rafael Carrasco! If you resist, this night—this moment—that couch will be your bed of death!"

Never in all my life was I more surprised at the effect of a speech. It was less tragic than ludicrous—like a farce following a fiery melodrama. Anticipating a desperate fight with the ferocious maroon and the gay goajiro, it almost made me laugh as the latter dropped down upon his knees, and piteously appealed to me for mercy; while the former was praying in the same strain to Gaspardo!

I left both to the tender mercies of the cazador, who proceeded to bind them hand and foot—neither offering the slightest resistance.

Myself turning, I took the rescued captive in my arms.

As she lay upon my breast, her heart beating time to mine, I knew she was safe; pure as when, the day before, our lips meeting, she received her first love kiss.

We left the two criminals in the shed, securely tied, to be sent back for, and brought to justice.

Then, returning over the trestle of roots—Engracia more tenderly conducted than when she went the opposite way—we regained the shore, and remounted our horses—she sharing my saddle.

We rode quickly back to the cafetal; but not there to stay. The casa grande was still ablaze. The roof was just falling in, the calcined timbers crashing down one after the other. To remain much longer would be but to behold a smoking, smouldering ruin.

We stayed only to take a last look at the scene of desolation. Then, turning our horses' heads, continued on to Batabano.

Next morning the first train of the camino de hierro carried us across the island to Havana; and before the hour of breakfast my novia was safely lodged in the house of her aunt—I, too, partaking its hospitality.

Before letting fall the curtain on this little drama of Cuban life, it must needs be told what afterwards came of the dramatis personæ who have appeared in it.

Taking the thieves first, left tied, as told, they were sent for as promised, and found as we had left them. Transferred from the frail palm-thatched shed to a strong walled prison—the calabozo of Batabano—they were taken out of this, tried, and condemned to death. Then returned to the gaol, and again brought forth, the second and last time, for execution by garrote.

The after-fate of the honest people is yet in abeyance. The "untutored Creole girl" is still a girl, living under the protection of her tia, in that suburban villa outside the city of Havana. And her brother is a General in the army of Cespedes; the brave Gaspardo by his side; both fighting for Freedom and "Cuba Libre."

God grant them victory!

"THE COMPULSORY BAPTISM OF THE MOORS"
FROM THE PICTURES

THE CONQUEST OF GRANADA, A.D. 1502."
J. LONG.

THE MOORISH PROSELYTES OF GRANADA.

The Moorish Kingdom of Granada was conquered in 1492 by the forces of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, reigning over the two united Kingdoms of Arragon and Castille; and this was the making of Spain as a powerful and splendid monarchy. During the first eight years after the conquest, Granada being placed under the wise and just rule of the Captain-General, Mendoza, Count of Tendilla, and of the Archbishop, Fray Fernando de Talavera, who were averse to religious persecution, the subjugated Moslems were left to enjoy their own faith in peace. The good Archbishop Talavera was, indeed, very desirous to make them Christians, but he sought to do this by teaching and evangelical persuasion. Though an elderly man, he learnt the Arabic language on purpose, and soon printed an Arabic version of the Church liturgy and selections from the New Testament. His apostolic spirit was shared by many of his clergy, and not a few converts were fairly won from amidst the subject Mohammedan nation, conciliated by a mild and impartial civil government.

Unhappily, it came to pass, after the exaltation of an austere bigot, Cardinal Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo, to the highest degree of Royal favour and delegated power, that the judicious policy which had already borne such good fruits was suddenly changed. Ximenes came to Granada with the Court in November, 1499, immediately forced his co-operation on the ecclesiastical head of that diocese, and stayed there when Ferdinand and Isabella removed to Seville. He summoned the leading Alfaqis, or Mussulman doctors, to a theological conference, in which he denounced the errors and defects of their creed. Inviting them to profess Christianity, he is reported to have offered not only the promise of spiritual and eternal blessings, but the worldly bribe of many rich gifts, especially of costly robes and other articles of dress. The vulgar part of the Moorish people often yielded to this temptation. It is said that not fewer than 4000 persons crowded one day to receive baptism, which Ximenes, as he could not separately administer the rite to each individual, performed by twirling a mop formed of hyssop over the heads of the multitude, to sprinkle each of them with a few consecrated drops.

These particulars are quoted by Mr. Prescott from the "Life of Ximenes," by Eugenio de Robles, who adds that the zealous prelate got the name of Alfaqui Campanero among the Moors, from his setting bells to ring in the towers of the mosques, when fitted up as Christian churches. It would have been all very well had he stopped at this point, but he presently began to violate the provisions of the treaty of peace and submission by which the Moors were secured against being made converts, except of their own free will. His first violent measure was to arrest and imprison a noble Moor, named Zegri, well skilled in Mussulman learning, whom Ximenes had in vain attempted to convince by argument. A few days of solitary confinement, bound in fetters, in a dark dungeon, with tolerable fasting, sufficed to make Zegri accept the baptismal rite; and this successful proceeding was repeated in other instances. The next order Ximenes gave was to collect all the Arabic books and manuscripts in Granada, not only copies of the Koran, or comments upon it, but treatises of science, histories, romances and poems, to make a grand bonfire in one of the great squares of the city. The number of volumes destroyed is variously stated, but a hundred thousand might be near the truth; only three hundred books, treating of medicine, were saved for the University library of Alcala. This act of folly may be set against the conflagration of the Greek library at Alexandria by the Caliph Omar eight centuries before.

Things went on from bad to worse at Granada, till a riot broke out in the quarter of the Albaycin, where two servants of Ximenes were slain by the Moors, and the palace occupied by the Archbishop of Toledo was besieged by a raging populace who threatened his life. Ximenes was rescued by the Count de Tendilla with a guard of soldiers, and the good Archbishop Talavera, like a true servant of Christ, went, almost unattended, or with only his chaplain and a monk bearing the crucifix, into the midst of the angry Moors, to whom he preached the message of divine and human charity with such tender force of feeling speech that their wrath was presently appeased. The excellent civil and military commandant, Tendilla, was not slow to follow this example of courageous gentleness. Leaving his armed guard when he came in sight of the Moorish mob, he threw his cap towards them as a token of his pacific intentions, and addressed them with an earnest remonstrance upon the folly of provoking a conflict which must bring severe punishment on their city and nation. They listened to his appeal, and presently went home in peace, while the Count de Tendilla left his wife and two children at lodgings in the Moorish quarter, to serve as hostages in pledge of his sincerity, with assurances that the revolt should be forgiven.

A few days after this tumult the King and Queen in their Court at Seville were engaged in an inquiry into the circumstances, and Ferdinand was at first disposed to blame Ximenes, who was the Queen's favourite Archbishop, for the acts of rashness and harshness which had so nearly caused a political disaster. But Ximenes arrived in time to plead his justification, which he rested upon grounds not merely of religious duty, but of statesmanship and the interests of the Spanish Crown. He affirmed that the Moors, while they remained infidels, could never be loyal subjects to a Christian Prince and Princess; but that the effect of the late revolt at Granada would be very advantageous, since they were now all involved in the guilt of treason, and liable to the infliction of its penalties. It would therefore be an act of clemency to offer them pardon, with the alternative of conversion or exile!

This edifying conclusion was approved by Queen Isabella, though not perhaps altogether by her more cautious husband. They sent a judicial commission to Granada, to examine into the causes of the late disturbance, and to condemn its guilty authors. "In the course of the investigation," says Prescott, "many of the principal citizens were imprisoned on suspicion. The greater part made their peace by embracing Christianity. Many others sold their estates and emigrated to Barbary; and the remainder of the population, whether from fear of punishment or the contagion of example, abjured their ancient superstition and consented to receive baptism. The whole number of converts was estimated at about 50,000, whose future relapses promised an almost inexhaustible supply for the fiery labours of the Inquisition. The circumstances under which this important revolution in religion was effected in the entire population of a great city will only excite feelings of disgust at the present day."

It need scarcely be said, in addition to this narrative, that Ximenes put a stop to Talavera's scheme of translating the Bible for the Moors to read. "It would be throwing pearls before swine," he remarked, "to open the Scriptures to persons in their low state of ignorance, who could not fail to wrest them to their own destruction." Such were the maxims and practices of a Romish prelate in Spain a few years before the Protestant Reformation in Germany and England. The picture by Mr. E. Long, which was in the last exhibition of the Royal Academy, forms the subject of our two-page Engraving.

ILLUSTRATED NEW BOOKS.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

All Londoners, and therefore all Englishmen, as everyone is more or less a Londoner in this country, must thank Mr. William Longman for his History of the Three Cathedrals Dedicated to St. Paul in London (Longmans, Green, and Co.). The author is known to be a sound English historian, as well as a liberal and judicious publisher of good books and a public-spirited citizen of London. His seat of business is so near St. Paul's Cathedral, and that noble English church building is so closely associated with his favourite literary pursuits, that no fitter man could have been chosen to lead the metropolitan and national subscription for completing its accessory adornments, and he acts, we hope with success, as chairman of the finance committee for that purpose. But this volume has no official character, though it should be carefully studied by all who are disposed to take an interest in the projected decorative finishing or the architectural merits and precedents of the grand City temple. None of our countrymen or country women ought to be ignorant of the history either of St. Paul's or Westminster Abbey; and we are indebted to the two accomplished clergymen, Dean Milman and Dean Stanley, who have, while presiding over their respective chapters, produced excellent books of antiquarian description of these mighty churches and their cherished monuments. Mr. Longman's aim is more especially, as we have remarked, to present an exact view of the architectural character of St. Paul's, with a practical intention to forward and direct the laudable work recently undertaken; and this task he has performed in a very efficient manner, with the assistance of Mr. Edmund Ferrey, Mr. Penrose, Mr. Cockerell, and other professional friends. In explanation of the title, it should be observed that, before the present majestic and elegant structure was raised, upon the ruins of the Great Fire of 1666, by Sir Christopher Wren, two preceding churches of St. Paul had occupied the site, which was once held by a Roman temple of Diana. The first Christian edifice, built in the seventh century of Christendom, was one attached to a monastery, founded by Ethelbert, King of Kent, when Melitus, the comrade of our missionary St. Augustine, was Bishop of London. This church lasted four or five centuries, till it was destroyed by fire in the reign of William the Conqueror, after which the vast and noble pile of "Old St. Paul's" was erected, but by gradual additions, not being completed until the middle of the thirteenth century. It is to be feared that many young people of this degenerate age know only so much about it as they may have learned from a romance by Mr. Harrison Ainsworth; but those of grave and serious mind are referred to Mr. Longman's careful description, and to the valuable illustrations supplied by Mr. E. Ferrey, for as much precise information as can be obtained. Yet it seems rather strange that of such a famous and popular building, which is so frequently mentioned by our old authors to the time of Charles II., and which is a conspicuous feature in so many old views of London, some questions of importance still remain undetermined; for instance, that of the existence of the two western towers. The central tower and spire, rising to a height 50 ft. above that of Salisbury Cathedral, must have formed a characteristic ornament of old London, like the dome uplifting its graceful bulk over the present city. Its effect was the better for just proportion to the great length, nearly 600 ft., of the building from which it ascended, and which had a breadth and height of nearly 100 ft. The style of architecture, ranging from Early Norman to Early English Gothic and Decorated, was not such as Sir Christopher Wren could appreciate, but we have learned again to enjoy its beauty and true significance. What he has bestowed upon us, agreeably to the taste of his age, which was still under the influence of the French and Italian Renaissance, is extremely different, but truly beautiful and sublime in its way—a building in the style of Rome, which we venture to think more perfect than even St. Peter's, because it has more unity of design, being the work of a single mind and hand. Mr. Longman's account of the arrangement for repairing or rebuilding the dilapidated cathedral, and then for the demolition of its old remains, the reception of Wren's different plans and designs, and the progress of the construction from 1674 to 1710, is a narrative of much interest. With reference to the design approved by the King in November, 1673, a model of which is preserved at the South Kensington Museum, that of a building in the form of a Greek cross and in the Corinthian style of architecture, it was rejected by the clergy as not sufficiently ecclesiastical. The choir was to be circular, and there were to be no aisles or nave. The dome would have been far less grand than that of the present cathedral, and, instead of the stately pair of campaniles at the west end, there would have been a small dome behind the portico, with no very imposing effect. It is fortunate that this design was superseded by Wren's later modifications, adopted upon his own independent authority, of another design, which was approved by the King in May, 1675, but which is condemned by Mr. Longman, and by most persons of ordinary good taste, as "poor and tawdry." King Charles, whose indolence had probably become tired of this affair, gave Wren permission to vary this design, of which he so boldly availed himself as to build something entirely different. In his old age, about five years before his death, the great architect was set aside by King George I.; but only some details of sculpture and decoration then remained to be done. In all matters of this kind Wren was continually thwarted by the narrow-minded obstinacy of official persons; but such is the fate of genius. The cost of the actual building is computed by Sir Henry Ellis at £736,752; but, including the cost of clearances and other preparations and embellishments to 1723, it may be set down at £747,661. The total amount received for this work, including £288,951 money borrowed, was not less than £1,167,474. It is known that Sir Christopher wished to line the dome with mosaic and to place a splendid baldachino in the choir, but there is no positive evidence of his views respecting any further decorations. Sir James Thornhill's paintings in the cupola are well known. No other step was taken in this direction for half a century after Wren's death. It was in 1773 that Sir Joshua Reynolds, at the Royal Academy, made a suggestion of some more pictures; this was gladly welcomed by the Dean and Chapter, but was refused by the Archbishop and Bishop as savouring of Popish superstition. Thornhill's pictures were restored by Mr. Parris in 1853. In 1858, when Bishop Tait proposed to Dean Milman the popular evening services under the dome, an opportunity was found by the Dean for appealing to public liberality in this cause. He submitted to general consideration "that, instead of the cold, dull, unedifying, unseemly appearance of the interior, the Cathedral within should be made worthy of its exterior grandeur and beauty. I should wish," he continued, "to see such decorations introduced into St. Paul's as may give some splendour, while they would not disturb the solemnity, or the exquisitely harmonious simplicity, of the edifice; some colour to enliven and gladden the eye, from foreign or native marbles, the most permanent and safe mode of embellishing a building exposed to the atmosphere of London. I would see the dome, instead of brooding like a dead weight over the area below, expanding and elevating the soul towards heaven. I would see the sullen white of the roof, the arches, the cornices, the capitals, and the walls, broken and relieved by gilding, as we find it by experience the most lasting, as well as the most appropriate, decoration. I would see the adornment carried out in a rich and harmonious, and as far as possible from a gaudy, style in unison with our simpler form of worship. After the experiments which have lately been made, to marbles and gilding mosaics would probably be added." In pursuance of this letter from Dean Milman, a sum of £24,000 was raised, part of which was spent in providing for the accommodation of the evening services, and part for the decorations of the building; but Mr. Longman disapproves of what has been done in the introduction of heavily coloured painted windows. Soon after Dean Milman's death a renewed effort was made to raise subscriptions, which by the end of July, 1871, amounted to nearly £40,000. The Queen's thanksgiving service, in February, 1872, for the recovery of the Prince of Wales from his illness, was made the starting-point of a fresh attempt to complete this national work; and Mr. William Burges has been appointed the architect for its execution when the funds shall be sufficient. In conclusion, after describing the cathedral as it stands, in which he follows Mr. Gwilt, Sir Henry Ellis, Mr. Fergusson, and Mr. George Wightwick, noticing also the criticisms which have been made of its architecture, Mr. Longman offers a very few suggestions for "the future of St. Paul's." He recommends that the interior of the dome, and cupolas of the side aisles, should be treated in mosaic, add that colour should also be obtained by the surface use of marbles laid upon the stone. Gilding in certain parts is indispensable; but painting, except as a mere coloured wash in required positions, must be rejected as unsuitable to our climate. Figures will therefore only be introduced in the mosaics of the dome, the cupolas, and the spandrels. The treatment of colour in the pavement is also a matter of great importance. We trust that the architect, the committee, and the cathedral authorities will attend to these modest hints from Mr. Longman; and we hope that his book will have the good effect of encouraging public liberality to supply the wherewithal.

The middle-aged reader of light periodicals will perhaps remember that his boyhood, in the reign of William IV., was amused with many a clever thing in Fraser's Magazine, which in those days followed the Edinburgh Blackwood in the path of humorous satirical personalities at the expense of literary or political bigwigs. The late Daniel Maclise, R.A., was the artist who sketched and grouped their portraits, while Dr. Maginn, the witty Irish scholar, who fenced with such rollicking fury for the Tory party, used to write the brief critical and biographical notices. This set of contemporary notables was not unlike the present series in Vanity Fair, or that in Once a Week; but the tone of Maginn's contributions was often too bitter, with a licence of detraction and obloquy which would not now be allowed. Those harsh strictures are corrected by Mr. W. Bates, a Professor of Classics in Queen's College, Birmingham, with notes and comments written in a milder spirit of maturer judgment, and with more attention to correctness of detail. The whole collection, entitled A Gallery of Illustrious Literary Characters, forms a handsome and entertaining volume, published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, successors to Mr. John Camden Hotten, of Piccadilly. Among the persons who figure in this book, to the number of eighty-three, are some who are praised or even flattered, as well as many ridiculed or defamed, by the reckless partisan scribe who accompanied the artist in his work of portraiture. We find here Sir Walter Scott, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Lamb, Campbell, Moore, Rogers, Washington Irving, Lord Brougham, Lord John Russell, Bulwer, Leigh Hunt, Theodore Hook, Sydney Smith, O'Connell, Carlyle, Thackeray, Buckstone, Cruikshank, and others of greater or less note, a few of them still living at this day. The portraits as engraved are of unequal merit, but most of them were thought good likenesses of the men as they appeared forty years ago; and they are full of characteristic expression.

One of the most desirable gift-books of the season is a volume containing sixteen fine examples of Our British Portrait Painters, with descriptive and historical notices written by Mr. Edmund Ollier, and recommended by his usual fine discernment and good taste. This volume is published by Messrs. Virtue, Spalding, and Daldy. The subjects which it presents are the portraits of La Belle Hamilton, by Sir Peter Lely; Garrick and his wife, by Hogarth; the Duchess of Devonshire and Sir Abraham Hume, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, with one of Sir Joshua himself by his own hand; Lady Hamilton, by Romney; the Royal Princesses, by Copley; also Princess Amelia, Princess Charlotte, the Countess of Darnley, Lady Dover, and Sir Walter Scott, by Sir T. Lawrence; Morton, the dramatist, by Sir Martin Archer Shee; Sir David Wilkie, by Phillips; the Royal Sisters, Princess Louise and Princess Helena, by Sant; and the portrait of J. W. M. Turner, by that artist himself. We regret to miss Gainsborough from the series; but those here given are eminently good, and they are fairly represented by the engravings as now reproduced.

Another book of this class, which will be very acceptable, is the Beauties of English Landscape, Drawn by Birket Foster (G. Routledge and Sons.) The engravings, by Messrs. Dalziel, Cooper, Evans, and Harral, are accompanied by extracts from some of the best English poetry, selected with judgment and suitable to the character and occasion of the view depicted by the artist, whose pencil has done so much to interpret the rural scenery of his native land.

An attractive volume published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall is that on the Manners, Customs, and Dress of the Middle Ages and during the Renaissance Period, by M. Paul Lacroix, whose nom-de-plume is familiar to readers of contemporary French literature as "Le Bibliophile Jacob." This book, which now appears in an English translation, is adorned and illustrated by fifteen chromolithographs and more than 400 wood engravings, which give a more distinct idea of figures and fashions than could be given by any mere verbal description. The extensive and various range of subjects treated by the author in above five hundred entertaining pages comprises all those curious details of social and domestic life which are desirable to make us feel at home with the people of former generations. He begins with an account of the legal condition of persons and lands from the fall of the Roman Empire to the decay of the feudal system in the nations of Western Europe; and with an examination of the established rights and privileges, whether feudal or municipal, that tempered the reign of rude violence during this period of a thousand years. But his third chapter enters the more agreeable domain of private life in the castles, the towns, and the dwellings of rustic peasantry. The houses, the clothes, the food and cookery, the games and pastimes, especially hunting and hawking or other fowling, the trade, money, and taxes, the commercial and manufacturing guilds, the courts of law and the secret tribunals of social vengeance or mutual protection, the fantastic and horrible punishments, and the pompous ceremonies of the olden time, are vividly described. A predominance is naturally given to that which belongs to the several provinces now united to form the modern state of France, including Normandy, Provence, Burgundy, and Lorraine, also to Flanders and the western and southern parts of Germany, with some Italian communities with which France had much to do. There is comparatively little here displayed of the manners and customs of our English ancestors, but this information is amply supplied by Mr. Thomas Wright and other learned antiquaries, who have a pleasant way of communicating their knowledge. The work of M. Paul Lacroix has the same literary and historical character.

The admirers of Ossian's poems, with whom we desire to have no controversy, should thank Signor Paolo Priolo for a series of vigorous and effective designs representing the chief incidents of the Gaelic narrative romance. His subjects are found in the stories of Comala, of Carthon and Croma, of the wars of Caros and Inisthona, of Fingal and Swaran, of Moirni, Gaul, and Eivirallin, of Fingal's dog Bran, the meeting of Basmuin with Fearg-Thonn, and the loves of Conlath and Cuthona. The artist has certainly produced a set of drawings which have in themselves a high degree of merit, and which are suitable to their purpose as Illustrations of Ossian's Poems. Each of the engravings, twelve in number, is explained by a short note setting forth the "argument" of the passage referred to in Ossian. These notes are supplied by Mr. John Murdoch, of Inverness, editor of the Highlander; and the publication is dedicated to the Duke of Richmond, as President of the Highland Society of London.

The late Mr. Keble's devotional poetry for the Sundays and Church holidays of the ecclesiastical calendar, entitled The Christian Year, has gained a place which it will long keep in the affections of a large class of serious readers. An illustrated edition of this very popular work is now published by Messrs. Routledge and Sons. The designs, of which there are sixty-two, engraved by Mr. Cooper, are contributed by Sir John Gilbert, Messrs. W. B. Scott, R. Barnes, H. C. Selous, and other competent artists; but a few are copied from Raphael's cartoons or some pictures by the old masters.

The familiar charm of natural truth and unaffected simplicity in the writing of our old friend Thomas Miller is always pleasing. We like no book of all the heap on our table better than his Common Wayside Flowers (Routledge), with its twenty-four beautiful drawings by Birket Foster, very nicely and carefully printed in colours by Edmund Evans. This is a more satisfactory gift than some volumes of twice or thrice its cost, and of great apparent splendour.

To the lover of the country—that is, of our own country—with its national and local history, there can be no more agreeable topics of description than he will find ably treated in The Stately Homes of England (Virtue and Co.). The authors, Mr. Llewellyn Jewitt and Mr. S. C. Hall, prepared these memoirs for the pages of the Art-Journal, in which they have mostly been published, but they are now enlarged and rendered more complete. The noble mansions and demesnes here visited are Alton Towers, in Staffordshire, Alnwick Castle, Northumberland; Haddon Hall, Chatsworth, and Hardwick Hall, Derbyshire; Arundel Castle, Sussex; Penshurst and Cobham Hall, Kent; Cassiobury, Herts; Mount Edgecumbe, Devon; and Cothele, Cornwall. These are illustrated by not less than 210 engravings. Several pleasant excursions may be enjoyed in imagination over the volume before us.

Mr. W. Ralston, an artist and story-teller possessing no slight degree of power in the humorous delineation of rustic life and native manners, comes before the public with Sketches of Highland Character (Edmonston and Douglas). His report of the talk of a company of drovers over their cups, on board the steam-boat going round the Mull of Cantyre, and his pictures of different figures and groups at the most animated periods of their conversation, are exceedingly droll, and full of genuine comedy. We feel almost sorry to arrive at Oban, and to part with such amusing fellows as Glenbogy and Scodarach, Mr. Cameron and Mr. Dobbs, though some of them have been quarrelsome. The six illustrations are cleverly and truthfully drawn, and are very effectively produced in the engravings by Mr. Bailingall.

Visitors to the Zoological Society's Gardens in Regent's Park may have admired the collection of beautiful coloured drawings in a room of the building opposite the kangaroo-yards, and close to the serpent-house. They represent many wild beasts and birds in the habits of their natural condition, amidst the scenery of forest, mountain, or river where these animals are commonly found, and often show them engaged in feeding, fighting, or pairing, with striking truth of gesture. The artist, Mr. Joseph Wolf, though we are not aware that he has ever travelled much in remote lands under a tropical clime, shows a wonderful knowledge of all these subjects, and a faculty in some degree like Sir Edwin Landseer's, of realising by force of sympathetic imagination the passions of the animals he has studied, and of rendering their characteristic expression in his pictures. He has contributed many drawings on wood or stone to books of travel or natural history or romantic fiction; but, intending henceforth to withdraw from that branch of employment, he lately placed in the hands of Messrs. J. W. Whymper and Ed. Whymper, for engraving, a series of twenty designs, which are accompanied with an interesting commentary by Mr. Daniel G. Elliott, the American traveller and naturalist. The Life and Habits of Wild Animals, published by Alexander Macmillan and Co., is an attractive table-book to beguile the dull hour of enforced social idleness in a drawing-room where the company have little to say to each other. They will find relief in a look at these stirring figures of the strong, the agile, the fierce and beautiful creatures, free to exert their utmost energies and to live after their nature in the wilderness that owns no human lord.

The accomplished art-critic and amateur artist, Mr. Philip Gilbert Hamilton, is a lover of our dumb companions—our dogs and cats, our horses, asses, oxen, goats, pigs, and poultry; and, dwelling as he now does in rural France, he has a familiar acquaintance with wild boars and wolves. His new book, Chapters on Animals, is ornamented with twenty etchings by Messrs. J. Veyrassat and Karl Bolmer, which add their charm of graphic truth to that of his pleasing style and spirit as a writer upon many agreeable subjects. The publishers are Messrs. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

We are pleased again to meet that indefatigable author of so many books on the structure and habits of animals, but more particularly of birds and insects, the Rev. J. G. Wood. His compendious work The Illustrated Natural History, which was published in three volumes, is now compressed into one (Routledge and Sons). Some additions have been made, and some corrections to keep up with the present state of zoological science. The engravings, from designs by Wolf, Zwecker, Harrison Weir, Coleman, Harvey, and others, are very numerous; and the general merits of the book, as a popular treatise, will continue to be its recommendation.

Nothing ought to be said in dispraise of A Book of Fair Women (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), and it is therefore not remarked by way of an objection that the idea of such a collection of soft-sounding verses, and fancy pictures of heroines more or less worthy to stir the twittering chords of a young man's heart, is a notion which may be regarded as commonplace. The editor, Mr. G. Manville Fenn, has been assisted by a number of poetical contributors to find something gentle and graceful to say upon each pictured subject. The "fair women" are forty in number, but not one of them will ever own to being forty in the years of her age.

The amateurs of pottery, and porcelain, and china ware, if they wish to be learned in those matters, are invited to peruse The History of the Ceramic Art, by M. Albert Jacquemart, which Mrs. Bury Palliser has translated (Sampson Low, Marston, and Searle). It is a volume of more than six hundred closely-printed pages, illustrated with two hundred woodcuts, twelve etchings on steel, and a thousand small representations of marks and monograms. The subject is treated by M. Jacquemart with extreme minuteness and on a very comprehensive plan, ranging from the manufactures of China and Japan, of ancient Assyria, India, Persia, and Egypt, and of classic Greece and Rome, to those of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance period in Italy and France, and those of Germany established in the eighteenth century. Mr. Chaffers, Miss Meteyard, and other writers have described the rise and progress of the art in England, and the great advance in it obtained by the genius of Wedgwood. This book, which carries the subject further back, will interest some of their readers.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC.

In accordance with the serious aspect of the season, first in importance—not in that respect only, but also as a product of the highest order of musical thought—must be placed the new edition, just published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co., of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio." Although this work is nearly as well known in Germany as the same composer's St. Matthew "Passion Music," the reverse is the case in this country. The latter was revived at one of the oratorio concerts (at Exeter Hall) in 1870, and has been several times repeated, the last occasion having been at the third concert of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, on the 13th ult., as noticed at the time. To the general English public the "Christmas Oratorio" is unknown, no London performance of it having yet been given. The knowledge of it, however, can scarcely fail to be soon largely extended by its production at the fourth concert of the society just referred to (on Dec. 15), and its preceding publication, as noticed above. Whether it can ever take equal rank with "The Messiah" in English estimation may, perhaps, be doubtful—this being so strongly identified with national as well as religious sympathies; but that the work of Bach is analogous in sublimity and genius to that of Handel has long been known to cultivated students, and may now be made more widely evident by the handsome and timely volume which Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. have placed within general reach by the smallness of the price required for its purchase. It is brought out in that convenient form (large octavo) which is now so frequently adopted, the print and paper are alike good, and the music is given with an English translation carefully adapted by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, who had previously exercised the same office in the edition of Bach's St. John "Passion Music," issued by the same publishers.

Another volume appropriate to the season (likewise from the firm of Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.) is a collection of "Carols, Old and New," the words of which are edited by the Rev. H. R. Bramley, and the music by Dr. Stainer. The design is to provide "a single source from which all who are so disposed may draw songs suitable in sentiment and style for the sacred and joyous season of our Lord's nativity." The book contains forty-two pieces, many of the melodies being ancient and traditional, others having been specially contributed by well-known composers of the day. In addition to the musical and antiquarian interest of the volume, it has a value as a handsome table-book, if only on account of the many beautiful engravings which it contains, executed by the Brothers Dalziel, from drawings by themselves and other eminent artists. A more acceptable gift-book can scarcely be found.

For younger recipients a handsome present is provided—also by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.—in a work entitled "Sacred Songs for Little Singers." The words have been supplied by Frances Ridley Havergal, and the music is composed and arranged by Mr. Randegger. The twelve pieces here comprised are calculated, both poetically and musically, to interest young children, and to cultivate religious sentiment and a feeling for melody.

Robert Schumann's "Hymn for Advent"—a setting of the "Advent-lyed" of F. Rückert, for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra—has just been published by the newly-established house of Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co., of New Bond-street. These publishers have already distinguished themselves by some publications of special interest, particularly by an edition of Brahms's "Deutsches Requiem," other large and important works being announced by them. That by Schumann, now referred to, is classed as op. 71, and it belongs, perhaps, to his best period. Messrs. Lucas and Weber's edition is very neatly printed, in large octavo form, with a capital pianoforte arrangement of the orchestral score, and a carefully translated English text (by Madame Macfarren), in addition to the original German. As with other vocal works of Schumann, the music of the "Advent-lyed" is so full of beauty that public performance must before long make it more generally known—a result that will be largely promoted by the opportunity now afforded of possessing it for the sum of two shillings.

Having noticed those productions which appeal to the religious sentiments of the period, we may turn to others of a lighter class, anticipatory of the social gatherings and festivities which succeed to the sacred observances of the season. Dance music, songs, and ballads of course here claim pre-eminence. To begin with the former.

Messrs. Chappell and Co.'s "Musical Magazine" has now reached its 105th number, the current issue being appropriated, according to annual custom, entirely to dance music for Christmas use. For one shilling we have here a collection of eleven pieces—waltzes, galops, quadrilles, by Strauss, D'Albert, and D. Godfrey, the latter of whom has contributed a new waltz. All the music here collected is well suited for its joyous purpose, and the number will doubtless find a large sale.

Messrs. Metzler's monthly serial, "The Popular Musical Library," also includes the issue of a special Christmas Number. Here, likewise, for a shilling, is a collection of dance pieces of various kinds, comprising the forms of the quadrille, the waltz, the galop, and the polka—nine numbers making up a good return for the small investment required. Among other names in the list of composers are those of Strauss, Offenbach, and Godfrey.

Another seasonable publication is "Cramer's New Dance Album" for 1874, the early issue of which will render it available for those social gatherings which prevail at the close of the old year as much as at the opening of the new one. The neat volume now alluded to contains a set of quadrilles, a waltz, a galop, and a polka by C. H. K. Marriott; and another set of quadrilles, by F. Godfrey, entitled "Merrie Old Times," and founded on old English melodies. In the galop Mr. Marriott has included a vocal intermezzo. All these pieces are spirited, and suited to the purposes of the various dances signified by their titles.

A further addition to the dance music of the season (from the house of Messrs. R. Cocks and Co.) is "The Naiads," by Hubert Herkomer, a set of five waltz movements, with introduction and coda. The quiet tone of the preliminary movement, "moderato," is well contrasted with the vivacity of those which follow, and the whole is wound up with a spirited finale. Messrs. Cocks have also issued a set of quadrilles, by W. Smallwood, entitled, "The Garden Party," and written for two performers on the pianoforte. The five movements comprised herein are appropriated to the well-known orthodox figures of the dance, the rhythms of which are well maintained in music that has much spirit, and can be rendered by four moderately skilled hands. A second set of pieces of a similar class, by the same hand (from the same publishers), is the "Moselle Quadrilles." These are written for a single performer, and will also be found well adapted for their intended purpose.

Among the musical publications suitable for Christmas gifts may be mentioned the first year's volumes, just completed, of the "Musical Monthly," a magazine of new copyright music, which has now reached its twelfth issue, in its two divisions of vocal and instrumental pieces. The work is published by Messrs. Enoch and Son, of Berners-street, and is edited by Sir Julius Benedict, who has contributed to each of the two volumes; among other well-known names associated with his being those of Franz Abt, Frederic Clay, M. Delaborde, M. Gounod, J. L. Hatton, Chevalier de Koutski, F. Kücken, G. A. Macfarren, Mendelssohn (in a posthumous song), C. Pissuti, A. Randegger, C. Salaman, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Henry Smart, E. Siles, Berthold Tours, W. Taubert, Wollenhaupt, and others. The work is beautifully engraved and printed, and the cost price is but a few shillings for the whole year's issue.

Of songs and ballads there is a plentiful supply, in the sentimental and other styles. To notice individually the multitude of new productions of these kinds would be impossible. All we can do at present is briefly to draw attention to some of the most prominent.

Messrs. Boosey and Co. have issued some pleasing vocal music, which will be welcome in drawing-room circles. In the ballad style, "One Happy Year Ago," by A. S. Gatty, is expressive; while "Letty's Dower," by Henriette, is of a somewhat arch character. Two songs—"Bride Bells," by J. L. Roedel, and "Only a Violet," by F. H. Cowen—are good specimens of the sentimental style. All these songs lie within a very moderate compass, and are suited for a voice of any calibre.

Among other active contributors to the stock of drawing-room vocal music are Messrs. Duff and Stewart. Their recent issues comprise several pieces that are well suited to the prevailing taste. Franz Abt's song, "Absence and Return," is pleasing in its melody, that and the accompaniment being devoid of difficulty. Mr. Hatton's "Song of the Sea-Breeze" has a robust vigour of style well suited to the nautical character of the subject. Mr. Lindsay Sloper's song, "Tit for Tat," has much piquancy, and will contrast well with pieces of a more sentimental kind. Mr. Levey's setting of "On a day, alack the day!" needs no recommendation, having found due praise in its performance by Miss Banks in the Drury Lane representation of "Antony and Cleopatra." Mr. Duggan's ballad, "Canst thou forget the past?" has an agreeable flowing melody, and may be made much of by a singer possessed of feeling. "Choose your partners"—words and music by R. Reece—is a song in waltz time, the characteristics of which dance-form are well preserved throughout. Lady Baker's song, to words by Gerald Massey, "This world is full of beauty," is simple and unpretending in style.

Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co. still maintain their publishing activity, proofs of which are before us in several new pieces. "Happy Voices," song, and "The Love Token," duet, are both by Odoardi Barri. The first may be made effective by a contralto or mezzo soprano, and the second by a voice of the same class in association with one of a somewhat higher range. "Clear the Way," by Miss Virginia Gabriel, was composed for Signor Federici, and is therefore intended for a baritone voice, but it is equally suitable for a contralto. There is much marked character in the melody, and the accompaniment is well in keeping, altogether forming a good specimen of Miss Gabriel's style.

From Messrs. Mills and Sons we have two new vocal pieces by Miss Elizabeth Philp. One of these is a song, "The Birds are singing for you and me;" the other being an Italian romanza, "La Pazza." The words of the former (by "M. H.") contain a nice vein of sentiment neatly expressed, and the melody and its accompaniment are extremely pleasing and appropriate. In the romanza Miss Philp has been equally successful. In each case the prevailing melody is interspersed with some recitative passages, with good effect of contrast. Both pieces lie within the most ordinary compass of voice.

THE CHRISTMAS WATCH.

There are different ways of keeping the vigil of Christmas Eve. Some would rather pass these hours of significant waiting with the congregation met for prayer and praise in a church or other place of Christian worship; but there are many who choose to be sitting in a circle of festive merry-makers round a blazing log-fire, with nuts on the hob, punch in the bowl, a cheerful smile on every face, and kind good humour in every heart of the assembled friends. Few persons, having their own free choice, would like on this night of the year to be in the place of Mr. Petherick's Highland sentinel, pacing the lofty ramparts of a fortress in the north country, with the flakes of snow whirling dizzily before his eyes, and with cold blasts of wind now and then cutting his flesh beneath the kilt, as he turns the corner to a more exposed side of the building. It is quite certain that Donald, or Colin, or whatever be his name, does not care a bodle for such nocturnal loneliness or the inclemencies of wintry weather; he is content to be on guard and on duty; the sharp wind and thick-falling snow are his old playfellows, from the earliest years of a hardy boyhood in the moorland cottage where he was born and reared. The even pace of his silent steps on the soft white surface which he treads is favourable to a prolonged meditation; and this may either lead his mind to dwell among those whom he loves, in the home that he left when called to serve his country as a soldier, or it may lend wings to aspiration for a higher flight, as the true Scotchman has a good deal of soul in his stalwart body, and seldom utterly loses the last trace of a sound religious education he has most likely received in his youth. Men of this race and character, in several well-known regiments of the British Army, have given proofs of their valour and fidelity wherever the flag has been carried. If it were not for them, who knows but that some foreign enemy might come to spoil our peaceful Christmas in London, and make it like that Paris Christmas three years ago?

Archæology of the Month.

In Bishopsgate-street Without remains to this day part of the mansion of Sir Paul Pindar, the wealthy merchant, contemporary with Sir Thomas Gresham. Sir Paul's house is of sixteenth-century date, and, though it has long been occupied as an ale-house, for some twenty years past a benevolent society has existed there for the relief of the poor, by gifts of bread and coals at the most inclement season; and a few days ago the society celebrated their anniversary by a dinner at the London Tavern, at which one hundred gentlemen were present, and subscribed £500—a much larger sum than hitherto collected on such an occasion, and entitled to special notice, even at this season of good cheer; all which, as Pepys would have said, "it is pleasant to see."

It is curious to observe how antiquities crop up after long intervals. A few days ago was described by a contemporary a house in Old Fish-street, with a grotto under it, beneath an old house in Knightrider-street, an illustrated account of which old place appeared in our Journal some twenty years ago.

A fresh entry with regard to the poet Chaucer has been found in the Record Office by Mr. Furnivall. In a schedule of the members of the Royal household—from the King to the stable-grooms—who were to have a gift of clothes at Christmas, in the fortieth year of Edward III.'s reign, A.D. 1366, the name "Geffrey Chaucer" occurs among thirty-seven "Esquiers" of the King.

Mr. J. R. Mortimer has examined three tumuli in the "Garton Stack," near Driffield, in which tumuli were twelve interments by inhumation and four by cremation. The relics accompanying consist of a jet button, bone pins, flint axes, knives, &c.; a fine earthenware food-vessel, and four elegantly-formed drinking-cups, one uninjured.

Sir James Thornhill, the Dorset worthy and father-in-law of Hogarth, it will be remembered, built an obelisk to the memory of George II. and Queen Caroline. Some years ago nearly the whole of the memorial was blown down, it is stated, during a storm. Mr. Boucher, of Thornhill House, has recently rebuilt the obelisk of Box stone, the whole solid throughout.

"The Peter's Pence Fund" is flourishing. According to the returns, they have amounted to 71,000,000*l.* during the last eight years. Late returns are stated up to the present to reach 400,000,000*l.*, so that there is no apprehension as to the safety of the temporal possessions of his Holiness.

The Messrs. de Rothschild have presented to the Paris Administration of Fine Arts several columns, statues, and bas-reliefs from the ruins of a temple dedicated to Apollo-Didymus, discovered in the neighbourhood of Mileto, Anatolia, in the excavations made at the cost of these gentlemen. These relics are to be placed in the Musée des Antiques at the Louvre.

Mr. S. H. Beckles writes touching the "South Wealden exploration" that in the boring now in progress the Kimmeridge clay would be the first sub-Wealden strata encountered, and so it has proved.

Outside the south-western walls of York, opposite the ruins of St. Mary's Abbey, clearance is making for a new station of the North-Eastern Railway upon the site used as a Roman cemetery for a great length of time. Here are found thick strata of Roman bricks, mortar, and pottery, mingled with fragments of wall-plaster, on which coloured patterns are still distinct; as well as a cemetery coffin, imperfect when it was bought—1600 years ago.

At the late meeting of the Archæological Institute the chairman—Sir S. D. Scott, Bart.—touched upon Sir John Lubbock's Bill for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments, the pith of which has been almost destroyed by the removal of "the compensation clause," at the instance of the Government. Two occasions have presented themselves for the exercise of the power of this bill—the destruction of ancient stone monuments in the West of England, and a proposal to alter Bamburgh Castle, in Northumberland, into a convalescent home, in pursuance of a scheme of the Charity Commissioners, which scheme, it is hoped, will not be carried out.

The union of City benefices progresses well. It is now proposed to unite St. Benet's, Paul's-wharf, with St. Peter's, Paul's-wharf; and St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe with St. Anne's, Blackfriars. St. Benet's was rebuilt in 1683, by Wren; it is of red brick, and has a domed tower. It contains a monument of Brooke, the Somerset Herald; and Inigo Jones was buried here: the first church was built more than 600 years ago. St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe was restored by Wren, in 1692, at a cost of £7060 odd.

Mr. T. J. Hutchinson has read to the Anthropological Institute a paper "On Explorations amongst Ancient Burial Grounds, chiefly on the Seacoast Valleys of Peru." The result of the author's examinations of the celebrated Pacha-Camac inclined him to the belief that there were no evidences of either a Temple of the Sun or a House of the Virgins there, as no proof exists that the Incas ever occupied those valleys after they are reported to have conquered them. The strange peculiarity in these pre-historic earth-mounds arises from the fact of their terraces all approximating to multiples of twelve. Dr. Sims also exhibited to the above society a flattened skull, found in Mameluke Island, Columbia River, and described the practice of flattening the head in infancy among the native Americans.

In Chelsea old church Sir Thomas More built a chapel, which does not belong to the church, but has for many years been possessed by private persons, who have made a gain of it by letting the seats. There is now an opportunity of buying the chapel for a moderate sum, but greater than the Incumbent can expect to raise unless assisted by his congregation; and, as he will make the chapel a part of the church, we wish him success in his good work.

Two of the stone cairns discovered on the banks of the river Ely, near Ayton, have been opened. They were found to contain human skeletons. The remains, which are said to be those of ancient Britons, are about 2000 years old.

A paper was recently read, before the Cambridge Philosophical Society, by Mr. Sedley Taylor, late Fellow of Trinity College, on "A Suspected Forgery in the Vatican Manuscript of the Trial of Galileo before the Inquisition." The object of the paper was to show, in accordance with the views of recent German and Italian authorities, that the sentence pronounced against Galileo, in 1633, was based on a spurious document fabricated for the express purpose of securing his condemnation. The evidence adduced to support this conclusion was taken partly from the works and letters of Galileo and partly from the contemporary records of the trial preserved in the archives of the Inquisition, portions of which have been lately published for the first time. The result of the paper was to exonerate Galileo completely from the charge of contumacy which all his biographers have hitherto either advanced or tacitly admitted.

Lovers of ancient art will rejoice, says the Globe, at a discovery just made in Cyprus. Held in succession by the Egyptians, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Roman, it is not wonderful that traces of their occupation should occasionally occur in the island. And Cyprus has furnished the archæologist with a goodly stock of materials. The latest addition promises to be of exceptional interest. At Palaia Lemeasos, the accepted site of the ancient Amathus, on the southern coast, and six miles distant from Limasol, men have for some time past been engaged in digging stones for Port Said, on the opposite coast of the Mediterranean. They unearthed a colossal statue, in calcareous stone, of Hercules holding a lion before him by the hind paw. The statue is perfect down to the knees, but the legs are wanting. It measures in its present shape nine feet in length. The limbs are thick set and heavy, and the whole is said to be of very archaic workmanship. This is the only information we have for an opinion on the age and origin of the same. Amathus was one of the oldest towns in Cyprus, and was colonised at an early period by the Phœnicians, who first introduced the worship of Hercules under the name of "Melkart" or "Malika." The work is, however, probably early Greek. Whether we shall have the means of judging for ourselves is doubtful. The discovery was made in a plot of private land belonging to the British Vice-Consul at Limasol, near Pietro Loiso. That functionary was quickly on the spot, settled about the price with the labourers, and thus became sole proprietor of the treasure, with a view of sending it to the British Museum. Then his difficulties began. The Governor of Cyprus interfered, claiming the huge relic of antiquity for the Imperial Museum of Constantinople. The dispute has not yet terminated, and will in all likelihood be shifted to Stamboul for settlement. Meanwhile, the statue, guarded by "zaptiehs," remains on the spot where it was found.

THE FIRST QUADRILLE

AND

THE LAST GALOP.

Precise and prim, demurely rigid,
With formal bows and curtsies frigid,
The first quadrille is gone through dumbly,
Each partner setting, turning glumly,
As though, in his and her despite,
Performing some funeral rite,
With solemn air, lugubrious grace,
All gladness banished from the face,
As quite unfitted for the season,
And to Decorum's self high treason.
Neglected wall-flowers all the while
Sit coldly mute, without a smile,
In freezing stateliness, until
The very air is icy chill.
The funny person's funniest joke
Seems in its utterance to choke;
Fast-sticking, frost-bound, in his throat,
As in Munchausen's horn each note
Froze as it formed, till genial weather
Set free the locked-up tunes together.

But soon the spirit of the hour
Exerts o'er all its magic power.
In virtue of Dame Nature's law,
Together youth and beauty draw—
As mothers run to infants' cry,
As hungry feed when food is nigh,
As to the magnet steel will hold,
As misers cling unto their gold;
And iciest natures thaw at last,
Like icebergs when the winter's past.
First that impetuous madcap Bella
Is bitten by the tarantella;
And straight the whole come following after,
With quips and cranks and ringing laughter.
St. Vitus has them in his grip,
And makes them, willy-nilly, skip.
Now all are frantically setting,
Chassez-ing, turning, pirouetting;
Advancing now, and now retreating;
Their steps such merry music beating,
That scarce the twanging violin
Is heard amid the boisterous din.

And when the last—the very last—
Mad galop comes they trip it fast,
To quickening tune increase their pace,
For Finis stares them in the face.
So round and round, and to and fro,
Like dancing dervishes they go;
And chased and chasing ever flee
In giddy maze of ecstasy.
Yet dansels in their swiftest flight
Can shoot their Parthian arrows bright—
Keen arrows, tipped with pleasing pain—
Into the breast of passing swain;
So frankly gay and debonair,
They have for each a smile to spare;
And with their partners hold a chat
Quite airy on this and that.
Sometimes, with deeper feelings stirred,
Their whispered talk is scarcely heard;
Soft question meets with low reply,
That bears the semblance of a sigh,
But 'tis forsworn by kindling glance
And greater fervour in the dance;
Entranced, around their partners twirling,
Meanwhile in larger orbit whirling;
As our fair moon doth circling run
Her twofold course round earth and sun;
Or as twin stars, bound with one tether,
Revolve perpetually together.
The final moment comes at last—
On wings of joy the hours fly fast!
E'en when the dance is at its best,
And not the stoutest thinks of rest;
While Mister Broad, with ponderous grace,
Though scant of breath, still keeps the pace,
Lured by that winsome darling Janet
To make himself a frisky planet,
Teetotum huge, or humming-top,
That once set spinning who can stop?
When yet with undiminished zeal,
Pursuing and pursued they wheel,
The dance is brought to sudden stand,
As nerveless drops the fiddler's hand.

Then come the cloaking, wrapping, shawling;
And fathers for their daughters calling,
The while some ardent lovers pray
For just a moment's sweet delay!
Only one word? some little token?
O joy! the magic word is spoken,
And lives all grimly dark before
With Love's warm hues are rainbowed o'er.

JOHN LATEY.

SCIENTIFIC RESULTS OF THE MONTH.

Professor Fleming Jenken, in the inaugural address which he lately delivered to the engineering class in Edinburgh University, has drawn public attention to the great loss from friction which occurs in working cotton-mills, amounting to at least five sixths of the whole power generated by the engine. In overcoming the friction of the engine itself, and of the heavy gearing in connection with it, he reckons that one third of the power is wasted; and the residue of the loss has to be divided between the friction of the shafting and of the different machines. The consequence of this loss is that it takes nearly as much power to drive a cotton-mill when run without doing any work as when every machine is duly performing its proper task; and it becomes a problem of importance to construct the machinery of cotton-mills in such a way as to make the waste from friction a minimum. We long ago called attention to the circumstance that, in the case of rolling-mills for iron of the old Welsh construction, nearly as much power was consumed when the mill was not rolling iron as when it was; and we deduced from this circumstance the conclusion that the complex gearing and the long trains of shafting which were the usual concomitants of such mills, should be discarded, and that a compound engine of the marine type should be coupled direct to each mill, which would thus be driven without intervening gearing. Professor Fleming Jenken shows that an analogous necessity exists in the case of cotton-mills; and in place of the old slow-moving engines, which involve the necessity of much intermediate gearing to bring up the speed, the proper course certainly is to employ compounds with the cranks at right angles, and with the reciprocating parts balanced on Mr. Bourne's plan, so as to reconcile high speed with steady working.

Various methods of purifying iron from sulphur and phosphorus have lately been propounded. By the Bessemer process of forcing a current of air through the molten pig iron only the carbon is burnt out. The sulphur and phosphorus remain in the metal, and it is an object of importance to be able to expel those contaminating ingredients. Tessie du Motay uses an aero-dynamic purifier, whereby certain chemical substances are passed through the molten pig to purify it. A flux is used containing lime, fluor-spar, oxide of iron, and manganese, and the iron is washed by this mixture while in a molten state, and the impurities are thus removed. Bodmer patents the method of injecting metals, carbon, and other substances into the molten mass; and Warner proposes to inject hydrochloric acid, chlorine, and other purifying agents. The use of electricity in the manufacture of iron has been often proposed, and occasionally tried with only very moderate success. But Forquignon again proposes to procure wrought iron or steel from pig iron by electrolysing the molten metal. Levallois proposes to manufacture non-oxidizable steel by melting together soft iron 93 parts, tungsten 6.5 parts, and nickel 0.5 part.

The Rev. J. Crawford has communicated to the Ayr Observer the results of some experiments made by him with creosote as an agent for preventing the potato disease, and, on the whole, the application has been very successful. With a small camel-hair brush every eye of the seed-potato was lightly touched with the creosote, and in the produce of the potatoes so treated no disease was found. Potatoes which had only some of the eyes touched yielded a partially diseased produce, and those of which none of the eyes were touched gave a produce much more diseased, while in the case of some which had been painted with the creosote too much the germinating power was destroyed. The germination of potatoes in winter may be prevented by exposing them to the vapour of sulphurous acid.

A correspondent of the Garden explains the true origin of the dahlia, first mentioned by Hernandez in his "History of Mexico," in 1651. But the first scientific description of the plant was given by the Abbé Cavanilles, from a specimen which flowered in Madrid, in 1790; and the Abbé named the plant after his friend Andrew Dahl, the Swedish botanist. The dahlia was sent to the Royal Gardens in Madrid, from the Royal Gardens in Mexico. It first flowered in Madrid in 1789, and was introduced by the Marchioness of Bute into England in the same year. But that plant soon perished, and the dahlia did not reappear until 1803, when the old single variety, coccinea, was flowered by Frazer, at Chelsea. Meanwhile, Cavanilles had sent the three varieties known in Madrid to Paris, in 1802, and between that time and 1814 many varieties were raised. Humboldt sent home seed from Mexico in 1804, and from this source the numerous varieties since obtained have been principally derived.

The Athenæum states that it had been thought probable that the periodical comet, which was observed in April and May last, and which was discovered at its previous appearance by Tempel, at Marseilles, in 1867, was identical with a cometary object seen at Paris by M. Goldschmidt, on May 16, 1855, when searching for the lost comet of De Vico. This hypothesis, however, has been disproved by Dr. van Asten, of the Pulikowa observatory, who has also shown that this comet is not the same as Comet II., discovered also by Tempel in July last.

A paper by Mr. H. Y. L. Brown, "On the Koetong Tin-field, situated about fifty miles up the Murray river, in Australia, has recently been printed. The great scarcity of tin renders any exposition of new sources of supply a matter of special interest.

To prevent drain-pipes from being choked by the roots of plants, Mr. Mechi recommends that they should be well coated with coal-tar. The roots, he says, turn away from the tar, evidently sensible of their danger. Without this precaution, he adds, no drain is safe near trees, fences, or even strong-rooted weeds.

Keegan's process for the preparation of wood-pulp for paper-makers is described in Dingler's Polytechnic Journal. The wood is cut into pieces $\frac{1}{4}$ in. thick and 6 in. to 12 in. long. These are heated in an iron digester with caustic soda, the pressure reaching to 50 lb. per square inch. After half an hour the temperature of the steam is raised to 300 deg. Fahrenheit, by which the resinous matter of the wood is made soluble, when it is washed out. The soda solution can be used over and over again, as it takes up little resin.

To print aniline colours on cotton, 50 grammes of gelatine are dissolved in a litre of water. Potassium bichromate is then added till the colour becomes a pale yellow. The aniline colour is then added and thickened with dextrine or gum. The pieces, after having been printed, are exposed for some hours to light, which makes the gelatine insoluble and it fixes the colour.

Efforts have been made in Dublin to work the public clocks by electricity supplied from a central source. An apparatus termed the chronopher has long been in operation in Greenwich street, London, which receives time signals from Greenwich, and telegraphs them to the chief towns in the kingdom; and the Astronomer Royal lately put this apparatus to a severe test by connecting it by a return wire with Greenwich, placing a galvanometer showing the return current in juxtaposition with a galvanometer indicating the direct current. The indications of the two galvanometers were separated by an almost inappreciable interval of time—certainly under one tenth of a second.

ASTHMA and BRONCHITIS effectually relieved by the use of DATURA TATULA, for "in a most fearful attack of asthma Lord Dunsany had scarcely smoked the Datura Tatula for more than a minute or so when the symptoms subsided, and in ten minutes he was wonderfully better. MISCONCEPTIONS RELATIVE TO MEDICAL ELECTRICITY.

(From "The Scientific and Literary Review," April, 1873.)

It is a singular fact that the first useful application of Electricity was that of restoring health. Ever since (a century ago) this branch of electrical utility has steadily progressed in spite of the many obstacles which every new discovery is certain to encounter. It was successfully promoted, first by outsiders, and then by scientific members of the medical profession, by whom Electricity, as a curative, is ultimately being generally adopted. The improved means of practically applying this subtle power is an important item in the progress of electro-therapeutics, and in the extensive and ever-growing literature, explaining the various medico-galvanic appliances in use, we find side by side with other scientific apparatus Mr. Pulvermacher's various inventions of Voltaic Chain-Bands, Batteries, &c., frequently treated upon in terms flattering to the inventor. We must, however, confess that it puzzled us not a little to find inventions which are so honourably connected with science and represented in its literature struggling for existence by advertisements in those columns of the daily press which are accessible to all comers irrespective of merit. This raised doubts as to the identity of the articles advertised and those referred to in the scientific press, but an opportunity having lately been presented to us of experimenting the apparatus, it at once brought home to our senses, physiologically as well as physically, its honest character and efficiency, thus removing our misconceptions, and at the same time explaining why these Chains have acquired such an honourable status.

By a glance at the construction of these Chains, the connoisseur will at once recognise the clever manner in which the inventor has satisfied the scientific conditions for electro-creation on the one hand, and those for ease of application on the other.

As we have above seen, the success, both scientific and general, is owing to great simplicity, coupled with great electrical efficiency; and this has, therefore, induced various other persons to put forward contrivances professing to possess similar powers and virtues. But these persons, either from ignorance of the scientific cause of the efficiency of Mr. Pulvermacher's appliances, or else desiring the penalties attending the infringement of his patent rights, claim to have found the secret of producing portable electric and magnetic contrivances without the use of an exciting liquid, and without magnets, thus endeavouring to mislead the uninitiated. The invention of Mr. Pulvermacher, we find, has been described and favourably commented upon in the following works:

"We, the undersigned, have much pleasure in testifying that J. L. Pulvermacher's recent improvements in his Voltaic Batteries and Galvanic Appliances for Medical Purposes are of great importance to Scientific Medicine, and that he is entitled to the consideration and support of every one disposed to further the advancement of real and useful progress."

DR. C. HANDFIELD JONES, F.R.C.P. and F.R.S., Physician to St. Mary's Hospital, under date March 10, 1866, in a Testimonial, states:—

"I am satisfied that he is an honest, earnest labourer in the field of science, and I think that he deserves to meet with every encouragement from the profession and from scientific men."

ACADEMIE DE MEDECINE, PARIS.

Extract of an official Report at a meeting, April 1, 1861:—

"The Voltaic Chains of Mr. Pulvermacher really are a most wonderful apparatus. They are more portable and cheaper—two indispensable conditions in an apparatus of this description, in order to make the application of electricity more general, and to a certain degree popular, which is certainly very desirable in the interest of patients, as well as that of the profession. The Committee beg to propose to the Academy to address their thanks to Mr. Pulvermacher for his most interesting communication. Adopted."—Bulletin de l'Académie, t. xvi. No. 13.

"THE LANCET" (No. 1, Vol. II., 1856):—

"This ingenious apparatus of Mr. Pulvermacher has now stood the test for some years. It may be used by the medical attendant, or by the patient himself, and the operator can now diffuse the galvanic influence over an extensive surface or concentrate it on a single point. In these days of medico-galvanic quackery it is a relief to observe of medico-galvanic quackery in a straightforward manner in which Mr. Pulvermacher's apparatus is recommended to the profession."

GALVANISM v. FUNCTIONAL DISORDER.

Withdeane, near Brighton, Jan. 9, 1873.
Miss J. M., aged 62, suffered for twelve years from obstinate constipation, and was continually obliged to take very powerful medicines. She wore one of your Galvanic Chain-Bands for three weeks, and found immediate and lasting relief. She left the Band off for five months and then wore it again for two days, and is now free from all uneasiness, and medicines rendered unnecessary. References permitted to Lady Ogil, Brighton.
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. RHEUMATIC GOUT.

8, Brook Cottages, Ulverston, Nov. 19, 1873.
Sir,—In gratitude I now write to inform you how your Voltaic Electric Band, which I procured from you less than a month ago, has benefited me. It was for Rheumatic Gout. I was advised to apply to you, which I did, describing how I was afflicted. You advised one of your Voltaic Electric Bands. I procured one from you, which, I am thankful to say, in three days took it completely away. Sir, I think them a most wonderful remedy. My general health, I am thankful to say, is so much better. I have not felt so well for years as I do now.—I am, yours gratefully,
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. DEBILITY.

Dunbar, N.B., Sept. 1, 1873.
Dear Sir,—It is with much pleasure that I am able to write and give the following account of the second manner your Galvanic Chains have acted upon me. I purchased a Belt, also combined Bands, in the beginning of July last. I have worn them faithfully according to your directions ever since, and received great benefit from them. I consider they are doing their work admirably. I am quite willing that it should be made public, with the exception of my name.—I shall ever remain your truly,
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. EPILEPSY.

Langford, near Bristol, July 1, 1873.
Dear Sir,—I beg now to state the good effect the Chain Band for my wife, who has been suffering for some years from epilepsy, and never felt the least symptom of a fit till a month after; then she expected me to feel a little of it, and she did for about three minutes, and then it passed away. She went on another in the evening, and felt the least of it. She is now as well as ever, and her life, with nerves wonderfully strengthened and restored. We think it, Sir, a wonderful cure, and she has felt the fit four years, sometimes twice a week. Her name is Harriet Collins. Now it is Mrs. Smith. I am able to tell you that my neighbour, Mrs. Pimley, who felt the neuralgia since wearing your Bands.—I am, Sir, yours respectfully,
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. SPINAL IRRITATION.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Nov. 1, 1873.
Dear Sir,—Twelve months ago I got from you a Chain-Band for my wife, who has been suffering for some years from irritation of the spine, the symptoms being aching pain in the back, constant pain in the chest, and loss of sleep. She had then been under medical treatment about six months, and had received some small benefit, but her progress was hardly discernible. Directly she began to wear the Band she felt better, and in a few days the symptoms were almost gone, and her strength increased. During the last six months she has been free from the pain in her back, and has a very few times when she has had a very severe cold, but she is now as well as ever, and we attribute this speedy recovery to the Band, at the same time advising everybody to get a Belt before their disease gets so far gone, as it would be a waste of time and expense.—I am, yours truly,
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. RHEUMATISM and LIVER COMPLAINT.

Wellington, New Zealand, near Melbourne, Aug. 1, 1873.
Dear Sir,—Permit me to congratulate you on the success which your admirable invention the "Chain-Band" has accomplished in the world. May you long enjoy the reward which God sends to those who do a justly merit! In 1865 I was suffering from rheumatism and liver and the adhesion of my liver to my right side. My painful complaint was pronounced incurable by two of the best physicians and surgeons in Sydney. After some nine months I accidentally read a notice of your wonderful cures you had effected. I immediately wrote my brother in England to purchase for me one of your strongest chains; he accordingly did so, and sent it to me. I applied the chain to my right side, and in a few days I was cured. The liver had brought down from the chest to its place, and the chain was re-established by itself.—Yours, very truly,
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. NERVOUS DEBILITY and WEAKNESS.

21, Norfolk-street, Glasgow, Nov. 4, 1873.
Sir,—Two years ago I bought one of your Chain-Bands for a friend who had been ill for eighteen months with low fever and general debility. She had been all the time under medical treatment, but received no benefit. She gradually sank month after month, until the end of the year, when she died. I am now able to state that she was cured by the use of the Combined Bands. One of the three proved so effective for her case, and she wore it constantly. In a month she was much better. Before long she was able to take her share of domestic duties, and in a month she was well. The effect of the Belt was marvellous. In a month she was much better; in a month she was well, and in a month she was cured. We have for the last two years worn your Belts as our family medicine. In any case of nervous debility, from whatever cause it may arise, we always had to the "Belt," and seldom, indeed, without complete success. As a restorer and preserver of health your Belts are invaluable.—Yours respectfully,
Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher.

40, Minne-street, San Francisco, California, U.S.A., July 6, 1873.
Dear Sir,—Some six or seven years ago I wrote to you in Dublin, Ireland, where I was then staying, for a set of your Galvanic Chains, and I have since received it. I can now safely say that what was not for these Bands I should have been long since numbered with the past, or perhaps worse, an inmate of some lunatic asylum. I got the Bands specially for a nervous attack which I was suffering from, and for which I consulted the most eminent medical men both in England and Ireland, without receiving any relief. I had not tried your Bands until a month ago, and I am now able to state that I am cured. I have been using them for four months, and I have since used them for rheumatism with a wonderful effect. Indeed, I have been at times so bad with this disease that I could not lift my arm to save my life, and I had to have one of your Bands. "THE LOVER'S LEAP."—DRAWN BY MARCUS STONE

FRIDA; OR, THE LOVER'S LEAP.

"Perhaps you will find," he said at last, with grief as well as courtesy, "many who speak one language striving to silence one another."

"He fights best who fights the longest. You will come with us, my Lord?"

"Not a foot, not half an inch," the Baron answered, sturdily. "I've a-laboured hard to see my best, and a can't see head nor tail to it."

Thus he spoke in imitation of what his leading tenant said, smiling brightly at himself, but sadly at his subject.

"Even so!" the young man answered; "I will forth and pay my duty. The rusty weathercock, my Lord, is often too late for the oiling."

With this conceit he left De Wichehalse, and, while his grooms were making ready, sauntered down the zig-zag path, which, through rocks and stubborn oaks, made toward the rugged headland known, far up and down the Channel, by the name of "Duty Point." Near the end of this walk there lurked a soft and silent bower, made by Nature, and with all of Nature's art secluded. The ledge that wound along the rock-front widened, and the rock fell back and left a little cove, retiring into moss and ferny shade. Here the maid was well accustomed every day to sit and think, gazing down at the calm, grey sea, and filled with rich content and deep capacity of dreaming.

Here she was, at the present moment, resting in her pure love-dream, believing all the world as good, and true, and kind as her own young self. Round her all was calm and lovely; and the soft brown hand of autumn, with the sun's approval, tempered every mellow mood of leaves.

Aubyn Auberley was not of a sentimental cast of mind. He liked the poets of the day, whenever he deigned to read them; nor was he at all above accepting the dedication of a book. But it was not the fashion now—as had been in the noble time of Watson, Raleigh, and Shakspeare—for men to look around and love the greater things they grow among.

Frida was surprised to see her dainty lord so early. She came here in the morning always, when it did not rain too hard, to let her mind have pasture on the landscape of sweet memory. And even sweeter hope was always fluttering in the distance, on the sea, or clouds, or flitting vapour of the morning. Even so she now was looking at the mounting glory of the sun above the sea-clouds, the sun that lay along the land, and made the distance roll away.

"Hard and bitter is my task," the gallant Lord began with her, "to say farewell to all I love. But so it ever must be."

Frida looked at his riding-dress, and cold fear seized her suddenly, and then warm hope that he might only be riding after the busters.

"My Lord," she said; "will you never grant me that one little prayer of mine—to spare poor birds, and make those cruel gaze-hounds run down one another?"

"I shall never see the gaze-hounds more," he answered, petulantly; "my time for sport is over. I must set forth for the war to-day."

"To-day!" she cried; and then tried to say a little more for pride's sake; "to go to the war to-day, my Lord!"

"Alas! it is too true. Either I must go, or be a traitor and a dastard."

Her soft blue eyes lay full on his, and tears that had not time to flow began to spread a hazy veil between her and the one she loved.

He saw it, and he saw the rise and sinking of her wounded heart, and how the words she tried to utter fell away and died within her for the want of courage; and, light, and hard, and mainly selfish as his nature was, the strength, and depth, and truth of love came nigh to scare him for the moment even of his vanities.

"Frida!" he said, with her hand in his, and bending one knee on the moss; "only tell me that I must stay; then stay I will; the rest of the world may scorn if you approve me."

This, of course, sounded very well and pleased her, as it was meant to do; still, it did not satisfy her—so exacting are young maidens, and so keen is the ear of love.

"Aubyn, you are good and true. How very good and true you are! But even by your dear voice now I know what you are thinking."

Lord Auberley by this time was as well within himself again, as he generally found himself; so that he began to balance chances very knowingly. If the King should win the warfare and be paramount again, this bright star of the Court must rise to something infinitely higher than a Devonshire squire's child. A fine young widow of a Duke, of the Royal blood of France itself, was not far from being quite determined to accept him, if she only could be certain how these things would end themselves. Many other ladies were determined quite as bravely to wait the course of events, and let him have them, if convenient. On the other hand, if the kingdom should succeed in keeping the King in order—which was the utmost then intended—Aubyn Auberley might be only too glad to fall back upon Frida.

Thinking it wiser, upon the whole, to make sure of this little lamb, with nobler game in prospect, Lord Auberley heaved as deep a sigh as the size of his chest could compass. After which he spoke as follows, in a most delicious tone,

"Sweetest, and my only hope, the one star of my wanderings; although you send me forth to battle, where my arm is needed, give me one dear pledge that ever you will live and die my own."

This was just what Frida wanted, having trust (as our free-traders, by vast amplitude of vision, have in reciprocity) that if a man gets the best of a woman he is sure to give it back. Therefore these two sealed and delivered certain treaties (all unwritten, but for ever engraven upon the best and tenderest feelings of the lofty human nature) that nothing less than death, or even greater, should divide them.

Is there one, among the many who survive such process, unable to imagine or remember how they parted? The fierce and even desperate anguish, nursed and made the most of; the pride and self-control that keep such things for comfort afterwards; the failing of the heart that feels itself the true thing after all. Let it be so, since it must be; and no sympathy can heal it, since in every case it never, never, was so bad before.

CHAPTER V.

Lovers come, and lovers go; ecstasies of joy and anguish have their proper intervals; and good young folk, who know no better, revel in high misery. But the sun ascends the heavens at the same hour of the day, by himself dictated; and if we see him not, it is our earth that spreads the curtain. Nevertheless, these lovers, being out of rule with everything, heap their own faults on his head, and want him to be setting always, that they may behold the moon.

Therefore it was useless for the wisest man in the north of Devon, or even the wisest woman, to reason with young Frida now, or even to let her have the reason upon her side, and be sure of it. She, for her part, was astray from all the bounds of reason, soaring on the wings of faith, and hope, and high delusion. Though the winter-time was coming, and the wind was damp and raw, and the beauty of the valleys lay down to recover itself; yet with her the spring was breaking, and the world was lifting with the glory underneath it. Because it had been firmly pledged—and who could ever doubt it?—that the best and noblest lover in this world of noble love would come and grandly claim and win his bride on her next birthday.

At Christmas she had further pledge of her noble lover's constancy. In spite of difficulties, dangers, and the pressing need of men, he contrived to send her by some very valiant messengers (none of whom would ride alone) a beautiful portrait of himself, set round with sparkling diamonds; also a necklace of large pearls, as white and pure as the neck whose grace was to enhance their beauty.

Hereupon such pride and pleasure mounted into her cheeks and eyes, and flushed her with young gaiety, that all who loved her, being grafted with good superstition, nearly spoiled their Christmas-time by serious sagacity. She, however, in the wealth of all she had to think of, heeded none who trod the line of prudence and cold certainty.

"It is more than I can tell," she used to say, most prettily, to anybody who made bold to ask her about anything; "all things go so in and out that I am sure of nothing else except that I am happy."

The Baron now began to take a narrow, perhaps a natural, view of all the things around him. In all the world there was for him no sign or semblance of any being whose desires or strictest rights could be thought of more than once when set against his daughter's. This, of course, was very bad for Frida's own improvement. It could not make her selfish yet, but it really made her wayward. The very best girls ever seen are sure to have their failings; and Frida, though one of the very best, was not above all nature. People made too much of this, when she could no more defend herself.

Whoever may have been to blame, one thing at least is certain—the father, though he could not follow all his child's precipitance, yet was well contented now to stoop his grey head to bright lips, and do his best towards believing some of their soft eloquence. The child, on the other hand, was full of pride, and rose on tip-toe, lest anybody might suppose her still too young for anything. Thus between them they looked forward to a pleasant time to come, hoping for the best, and judging everyone with charity.

The thing that vexed them most (for always there must, of course, be something) was the behaviour of Albert, nephew to the Baron, and most loving cousin to Frida. Nothing they could do might bring him to spend his Christmas with them; and this would be the first time ever since his long-clothed babyhood that he had failed to be amongst them, and to lead or follow, just as might be required of him. Such a guest has no small value in a lonely neighbourhood, and years of usage mark the circle of the year without him.

Christmas passed, and New-Year's Day, and so did many other days. The Baron saw to his proper work, and took his turn of hunting, and entertained his neighbours, and pleased almost everybody. Much against his will, he had consented to the marriage of his daughter with Lord Auberley—to make the best of a bad job, as he told Sir Maunder Meddleby. Still, this kind and crafty father had his own ideas; for the moment he was swimming with the tide to please his daughter, even as for her dear sake he was ready to sink beneath it. Yet, these fathers have a right to form their own opinions; and for the most part they believe that they have more experience. Frida laughed at this, of course, and her father was glad to see her laugh. Nevertheless, he could not escape some respect for his own opinion, having so rarely found it wrong; and his own opinion was that something was very likely to happen.

In this he proved to be quite right. For many things began to happen, some on the right and some on the left hand of the Baron's auguries. All of them, however, might be reconciled exactly with the very thing he had predicted. He noticed this, and it pleased him well, and inspired him so that he started anew for even truer prophecies. And everybody round the place was born so to respect him, that if he missed the mark a little they could hit it for him.

Things stood thus at the old Ley Manor—and folk were content to have them so, for fear of getting worse, perhaps—towards the end of January, A.D. 1643. De Wichehalse had vowed that his only child—although so clever for her age, and prompt of mind and body—should not enter into marriage until she was in her eighteenth year. Otherwise, it would, no doubt, have all been settled long ago; for Aubyn Auberley sometimes had been in the greatest hurry. However, hither he must come now, as everybody argued, even though the fate of England hung on his stirrup-leather. Because he had even sent again, with his very best intentions, fashionable things for Frida, and the hottest messages; so that, if they did not mean him to be quite beside himself, everything must be smoking for his wedding at the Candlemas.

But when everything, and even everybody also—save Albert and the Baron, and a few other obstinate people—was and were quite ready and rejoicing for a grand affair, to be celebrated with well-springs of wine and delightfully cordial Watersmeet, rocks of beef hewn into valleys, and conglomerate cliffs of pudding; when ruddy dame and rosy damsel were absorbed in "what to wear," and even steady farmers were in "practice for the back step," in a word, when all the country was gone wild about Frida's wedding—one night there happened to come a man.

This man tied his horse to a gate and sneaked into the back yard, and listened in a quiet corner, knowing, as he did, the ins and outs and ways of the kitchen. Because he was that very same man who understood the women so, and made himself at home by long experience in new places. It had befallen this man, as it always befell any man of perception, to be smitten with the kindly loveliness of Frida. Therefore, now, although he was as hungry as ever he had been, his heart was such that he heard the sound of dishes, yet drew no nearer. Experience of human nature does not always spoil it.

CHAPTER VI.

When the Baron at last received the letter which this rider had been so abashed to deliver, slow but lasting wrath began to gather in his grey-lashed eyes. It was the inborn anger of an honest man at villainy, mixed with lofty scorn and traversed by a deep anxiety. Withal he found himself so helpless that he scarce knew what to do. He had been to Frida both a father and a mother, as she often used to tell him when she wanted something; but now he felt that no man could administer the velvet touches of the female sympathy.

Moreover, although he was so kind, and had tried to think what his daughter thought, he found himself in a most ungenial mood for sweet condolence. Any but the best of fathers would have been delighted with the proof of all his prophecies and the riddance of a rogue. So that even he, though dwelling in his child's heart as his own, read this letter (when the first emotions had exploded) with a real hope that things, in the long run, would come round again.

"To my most esteemed and honoured friend the Lord de Wichehalse, these from his most observant and most grateful Aubyn Auberley,—Under command of his Majesty our most Royal Lord and King, I have this day been joined in bands of holy marriage with her Highness the Duchess of B—, in France. At one time I had hope of favour with your good Lordship's daughter, neither could I have desired more complete promotion. But the service of the kingdom and the doubt of my own desert have forced me, in these troublous times, to forego my own ambition. Our lord the King enjoins you with his Royal commendation to bring your forces towards Bristow by the day of St. Valentine. There shall I be in hope to meet your Lordship, and again find pleasure in such goodly company. Until then I am your Lordship's poor and humble servant, AUBYN AUBERLEY."

Lord de Wichehalse made his mind up not to let his daughter know until the following morning what a heavy blow had fallen on her faith and fealty. But, as evil chance would have it, damsels of the house—and most of all the gentle cook-maid—could not but observe the rider's state of mind towards them. He managed to eat his supper in a dark state of parenthesis; but after that they plied him with some mental mixtures, and, being only a man at best, although a very trusty one, he could not help the rise of manly wrath at every tumbler. So, in spite of dry experience and careful discretion, at last he let the women know the whole of what himself knew. Nine good females crowded round him, and of course, in their kind bosoms every word of all his life germinated ninety-fold.

Hence it came to pass that, after floods of tears in council and stronger language than had right to come from an apron, Frida's nurse (the old herb-woman, now a "Mother Eyebright") was appointed to let her know very night the whole of it. Because my Lord might be mooning for a month about it, betwixt his love of his daughter and his quiet way of taking things; and all that what dresses might be cut, and trimmed, and fitted to a size, and fashion all gone by before there came a wedding.

Mother Eyebright so was called both from the brightness of her eyes and her faith in that little simple flower the Euphrasia. Though her own love-tide was over, and the romance of her life had long relapsed into the old allegiance to the hour of dinner, yet her heart was not grown tough to the troubles of the young ones; therefore all that she could do was done, but was little.

Frida, being almost tired with the blissful cares of dress, happened to go up that evening earlier than her wont to bed. She sat by herself in the firelight, with many gorgeous things around her—wedding presents from great people, and (what touched her more) the humble offerings of her cottage friends. As she looked on these and thought of all the goodwill thus expressed, and how a little kindness gathers such a harvest of gratitude, glad tears shone in her bright eyes, and she wished that all the world could be as blessed as she was.

To her entered Mother Eyebright, now unworthy of the name; and sobbing, writhing, crushing anguish in a thing, even Frida, simple and open-hearted one, would rather be her own poor self.

CHAPTER VII.

Upon the following day she was not half so wretched and lamentable as was expected of her. She even showed a calm and pleasant air to the chief sempstress, and bade her bring some pretty things for the time of her own wedding. Even her father she behaved as if there had been nothing more than happens every day. The worthy Baron went to fold her arms, and let her cry there; but she only gave him a kiss, and asked the maid for some salt butter. Lord de Wichehalse, being disappointed of his outlet, thought (as all his life he had been forced to think continually) that any sort of woman, whether young or old, is wonderful. And so she carried on, and no one well could understand her.

She, however, in her own heart, knew the ups and downs of it. She alone could feel the want of any faith remaining, the ache of ever stretching forth and laying hold on nothing. Her mind had never been encouraged—as with maidens nowadays—to magnify itself, and soar, and scorn the heart that virtuals it. All the deeper was her trouble, being less to be explained.

For a day or two the story is that she contrived to keep her distance, and her own opinion of what had been done to her. Child and almost baby as her father had considered her, even he was awed from asking what she meant to do about it. Something seemed to keep her back from speaking of her trouble, or hearing to have it spoken of. Only to her faithful hound, with whom she now began again to wander in the oak-wood, to him alone had she the comfort of declaring anything. This was a dog of fine old English breed and high connections, his great-grandmother having owned a kennel at Whitehall itself—a very large and well-conducted dog, and now an old one, going down into his grave without a stain upon him. Only he had shown such foul contempt of Aubyn Auberley, proceeding to extremes of ill-behaviour towards his raiment, that for months young Frida had been forced to keep him chained, and take her favourite walks without him.

"Ah! Lear," now she cried, with sense of long injustice towards him; "you were right, and I was wrong; at least—at least it seems so."

"Lear," so called whether by some man who had heard of Shakspeare, or (as seems more likely) from his peculiar way of contemplating the world at his own angle, shook his ears when thus addressed, and looked too wise for any dog to even suspect his wisdom.

Frida now allowed this dog to lead the way, and she would follow, careless of whatever mischief might be in the road for them. So he led her, without care, or even thought, on her part, to a hut upon the beach of Woody Bay; where Albert had set up his staff, to think of her, and watch her. This, her cousin and true lover, had been grieving for her sorrow to the utmost power of a man who wanted her himself. It may have been beyond his power to help saying to himself sometimes, "How this serves her right, for making such a laughing-stock of me!" Nevertheless, he did his utmost to be truly sorrowful.

And now, as he came forth to meet her, in his fishing-dress and boots (as different a figure as could be from Aubyn Auberley), memories of childish troubles and of strong protection thrilled her with a helpless hope of something to be done for her. So she looked at him, and let him see the state her eyes were in with constant crying, when there was not anyone to notice it. Also, she allowed him to be certain what her hands were like, and to be surprised how much she had fallen away in her figure. Neither was she quite as proud as might have been expected, to keep her voice from trembling or her plundered heart from sobbing. Only, let not anybody say a word to comfort her. Anything but that she now could bear, as she bore everything. It was, of course, the proper thing for everyone to scorn her. That, of course, she had fully earned, and met it, therefore, with disdain. Only, she could almost hate anybody who tried to comfort her.

Albert de Wichehalse, with a sudden start of intuition, saw what her father had been unable to descry or even dream. The worthy baron's time of life for fervid thoughts was over; for him despairing love was but a poet's fiction, or a joke against a pale young lady. But Albert felt, from his own case, from burning jealousy suppressed, and cold neglect put up with, and all the other many-pointed aches of vain devotion, how sad must be the state of things when plighted faith was shattered also, and great ridicule left behind, with only a young girl to face it, motherless, and having none to stroke dishevelled hair, and coax the troubles by the firelight. However, this good fellow did the utmost he could do for her. Love and pity led him into dainty loving-kindness; and when he could not find his way to say the right thing, he did better—he left her to say it. And so well did he move her courage, in his old protective way, without a word that could offend her or depreciate her love, that she for the moment, like a woman, wondered at her own despair. Also, like a woman, glancing into this and that, instead of any steadfast gazing, she had wholesome change of view, winning sudden insight into Albert's thoughts concerning her. Of course, she made up her mind at once, although her heart was aching so for want of any tenant, in a moment to extinguish any such presumption. Still, she would have liked to have it made a little clearer, if it were for nothing else than to be sure of something.

Albert saw her safely climb the steep and shaly walk that led, among retentive oak-trees, or around the naked gully, all the way from his lonely cottage to the light, and warmth, and comfort of the peopled Manor House. And within himself he thought, the more from contrast of his own cold comfort and untended state—

"Ah! she will forget it soon; she is so young. She will soon get over that gay frippard's fickleness. To-morrow I will start upon my little errand cheerfully. After that she will come round; they cannot feel as we do."

Full of these fond hopes, he started on the following morning with set purpose to compel the man whom he had once disliked, and now despised unspeakably, to render some account of despite done to such a family. For, after all, the dainty Viscount was the grandson of a goldsmith who by brokerage for the Crown had earned the balls of his coronet. In quest of this gay fellow went the stern and solid Albert, leaving not a word about his purpose there behind him, but allowing everybody to believe what all found out. All found out, as he expected, that he was gone to sell his hay, perhaps as far as Taunton; and all the parish, looking forward to great rise of forage, felt indignant that he had not doubled his price, and let them think.

Alack-a-day and all the year round! that men perceive not how the women differ from them in the very source of thought. Albert never dreamed that his cousin, after doing so long without him, had now relapsed quite suddenly into her childish dependence upon him. And when she heard, on the following day, that he was gone for the lofty purpose of selling his seven ricks of hay, she said not a word, but only felt her cold heart so much colder.

CHAPTER VIII.

She had nothing now to do, and nobody to speak to; though her father did his utmost, in his kind and clumsy way, to draw his darling close to him. But she knew that all along he had disliked her idol, and she fancied, now and then, that this dislike had something perhaps to do with what had befallen her. This, of course, was wrong on her part. But when youth and faith are wronged the hurt is very apt to fly to all the tender places. Even the weather also seemed to have taken a turn against her. No wholesome frost set in to brace the slackened joints and make her walk until she began to tingle; neither was there any snow, to spread a new cast on the rocks, and gift the trees with airiness; nor even what mild winters, for the most part, bring in counterpoise—soft obedient skies, and trembling pleasure of the air and earth. But—as over her own love—over all the country hung just enough of mist and chill to shut out cheerful prospect, and not enough to shut folk in to the hearth of their own comfort.

In her dull, forlorn condition, Frida still, through force of habit or the love of solitude, made her daily round of wood and rock, sea-shore and moorland. Things seemed to come across her now, instead of her going to them; and her spirit failed at every rise of the hilly road against her. In that dreary way she lingered, hoping nothing, fearing nothing, showing neither sigh nor tear, only seeking to go somewhere and be lost from self and sorrow in the cloudy and dark day.

Often thus the soft low moaning of the sea encompassed her, where she stood, in forgotten beauty, careless of the wind and wave. The short, uneasy heave of waters in among the kelpy rocks, flowing from no swell or furrow on the misty glass of sea, but like a pulse of discontent, and longing to go further; after the turn, the little rattle of invaded pebbles, the lithe relapse and soft shampooing lambency of oar-weed, then the laved boulders pouring gritty runnels back again, and every basined outlet wavering towards another inlet;—these, and every phase of each innumerable to-and-fro, made or met their impress in her fluctuating misery.

"It is the only rest," she said; "the only chance of being quiet, after all that I have done, and all that people say of me."

None had been dastard enough to say a syllable against her; neither had she, in the warmest faith of love, forgotten truth; but her own dejection drove her, not to revile the world (as sour natures do consistently), but to shrink from sight, and fancy that the world was reviling her.

While she fluttered thus and hovered over the cold verge of death, with her sore distempered spirit scarcely sure of anything, tidings came of another trouble, and turned the scale against her. Albert de Wichehalse, her trusty cousin and true lover, had fallen in a duel with that recreant and miscreant Lord Auberley. The strictest orders were given that this should be kept for the present from Frida's ears; but what is the use of the strictest orders when a widowed mother raves? Albert's mother vowed that "the shameless jilt" should hear it out, and slipped her guards and waylaid Frida on the morn of Candlemas, and overbore her with such words as may be well imagined.

"Auntie," said the poor thing at last, shaking her beautiful curls, and laying one little hand to her empty heart; "don't be cross with me to-day. I am going home to be married, Auntie. It is the day my Aubyn always fixed, and he never fails me."

"Little fool!" her aunt exclaimed, as Frida kissed her hand and curtsied, and ran round the corner; "one comfort is to know that she is as mad as a mole, at any rate."

CHAPTER IX.

Frida, knowing—perhaps, more deeply than that violent woman thought—the mischief thus put into her, stole back to her bed-room, and, without a word to any one, tired her hair in the Grecian snood, which her lover used to admire so, and arrayed her soft and delicate form in all the bridal finery. Perhaps, that day, no bride in England—certainly none of her youth and beauty—treated her favourite looking-glass with such contempt and ingratitude. She did not care to examine herself, through some reluctant sense of havoc, and a bitter fear that some one might be disappointed in her. Then at the last, when all was ready, she snatched up her lover's portrait (which for days had been cast aside and cold), and, laying it on her bosom, took a snatch of a glance at her lovely self.

After some wonder she fetched a deep sigh—not from clearly thinking anything, but as an act of nature—and said, "Good-bye!" for ever, with a little smile of irony, to her looking-glass, and all the many pretty things that knew her.

It was her bad luck, as some people thought thereafter—or her good luck, as herself beheld it—to get down the stairs and out of the house without anyone being the wiser. For the Widow de Wichehalse, Albert's mother, had not been content with sealing the doom of this poor maiden, but in that highly-excited state, which was to be expected, hurried into the house, to beard the worthy Baron in his den. There she found him; and, although he said and did all sympathy, the strain of parental feelings could not yield without "hysterics."

All the servants, and especially Mother Eyebright (whose chief duty now was to watch Frida), were called by the terrified Baron, and with one unanimous rush replied; so that the daughter of the house left it without notice, and before any glances was out of sight, in the rough ground where the deer were feeding, and the amber oak-leaves hung.

It was the dainty time when first the year begins to have a little hope of meaning kindly—when in the quiet places often, free from any haste of wind, or hinderances of pattering thaw, small and unimportant flowers have a little knack of dreaming that the world expects them. Therefore neither do they wait for leaves to introduce them, nor much weather to encourage, but in shelby corners come, in a day, or in a night—no man knows quite which it is; and there they are, as if by magic, asking, "Am I welcome?" And if anybody sees them, he is sure to answer "Yes."

Frida, in the sheltered corners and the sunny nooks of rock, saw a few of these little things delicately trespassing upon the petulance of spring. Also, though her troubles wrapped her with an icy mantle, softer breath of Nature came, and sighed for her to listen to it, and to make the best of all that is not past the sighing. More than once she stopped to listen, in the hush of the timid south wind creeping through the dishevelled wood; and once, but only once, she was glad, to see her first primrose and last, and stooped to pluck, but, on second thoughts, left it to outblossom her.

So, past many a briared rock, and dingle buff with littered fern, green holly copse where lurked the woodcock, and arcades of zigzag oak, Frida kept her bridal robe from spot, or rent, or blemish. Passing all these little pleadings of the life she had always loved, at last she turned the craggy corner into the ledge of the windy cliff.

Now below her there was nothing but repose from shallow thought; rest from all the little troubles she had made so much of; deep eternal satisfaction in the arms of something vast. But all the same, she did not feel quite ready for the great jump yet.

The tide was in, and she must wait at least until it began to turn, otherwise her white satin velvet would have all its pile set wrong, if ever anybody found her. There could be no worse luck than that for any bride on her wedding-day; therefore up the rock-walk Frida kept very close to the landward side.

All this way she thought of pretty little things said to her in the early days of love. Many things that made her smile because they had gone so otherwise, and one or two that would have fetched her tears, if she had any. Filled with vain remembrance thus, and counting up the many presents sent to her for this occasion, but remaining safe at home, Frida came to the little coving bower just inside the Point, where she could go no further. Here she had received the pledges, and the plight, and honour; and here her light head led her on to look for something faithful.

"When the tide turns I shall know it. If he does not come by that time, there will be no more to do. It will be too late for weddings, for the tide turns at twelve o'clock. How calm and peaceful is the sea! How happy are the sea-gulls, and how true to one another!"

She stood where, if she had cared for life, it would have been certain death to stand, so giddy was the height, and the rock beneath her feet so slippery. The craggy headland, "Duty Point," well known to every navigator of that rock-bound coast, commands the channel for many a league, facing eastward the Castle Rock and Countisbury Foreland, and westward Highveer Point, across the secluded cove of Leymouth. With one sheer fall of a hundred fathoms the stern cliff meets the baffled sea—or met it then, but now the level of the tide is lowering. Air and sea were still and quiet; the murmur of the multitudinous wavelets could not climb the cliff; but loops and curves of snowy braiding on the dark grey water showed the set of tide and shift of current in and out the buried rocks.

Standing in the void of fear, and gazing into the deep of death, Frida loved the pair of sea-gulls hovering half-way between her and the soft grey sea. These good birds had found a place well suited for their nesting, and sweetly screamed to one another that it was a contract. Frida watched how proud they were, and how they kept their strong wings sailing and their grey backs flat and quivering, while with buoyant bosom each made circles round the other.

As she watched, she saw the turning of the tide below them. The streaky bends of curdled water, lately true as fairy-rings, stopped and wavered, and drew inward on their flowing curves, and outward on the side towards the ebb. Then the south wind brought the distant toll of her father's turret-clock, striking noon with slow deliberation and dead certainty.

Frida made one little turn towards her bower behind the cliff, where the many sweet words spoken drew her to this last of hope. All was silent. There was no one. Now was the time to go home at last.

Suddenly she felt a heavy drag upon her velvet skirt. Ancient Lear had escaped from all the chain she had put on him, and, more trusty than mankind, was come to keep his faith with her.

"You fine old dog, it is too late! The clock has struck. The tide has turned. There is no one left to care for me; and I have ruined everyone. Good-bye, you only true one!"

Submissive as he always was, the ancient dog lay down when touched, and drew his grizzled eyelids meekly over his dim and sunken eyes. Before he lifted them again Frida was below the sea-gulls, and beneath the waves they fished.

Lear, with a puzzled sniff, arose and shook his head, and peered, with his old eyes full of wistful wonder, down the fearful precipice. Seeing something, he made his mind up, gave one long re-echoed howl, then tossed his mane, like a tawny wave, and followed down the death-leap.

Neither body was ever found; and the whole of this might not have been known so clearly as it is known, unless it had happened that Mother Eyebright, growing uneasy, came round the corner just in time to be too late. She, like a sensible woman, never dreamed of jumping after them, but ran home so fast that she could not walk to church for three months afterwards; and when her breath came back was enabled to tell tenfold of all she had seen.

One of the strangest things in life is the way in which we mortals take the great and fatal blows of life.

For instance, the Baron was suddenly told, while waiting for Frida to sit beside him, at his one o'clock dinner,

"Plaize, my Lord, your Lordship's darter hath a been and jumped off Duty Point."

"What an undutiful thing to do!" was the first thing Lord de Wichehalse said; and those who knew no better thought that this was how he took it.

Aubyn Auberley, however, found a different measure of a broken-hearted father's strength. For the Baron buckled on the armour of a century ago, which had served his grandsire through hard blows in foreign battles, and, with a few of his trusty servants, rode to join the Parliament. It happened so that he could not make redress of his ruined life until the middle of the summer. Then, at last, his chance came to him, and he did not waste it. Viscount Auberley, who had so often slipped away and laughed at him, was brought to bay beneath a tree in the famous fight of Lansdowne.

The young man offered to hold parley, but the old man had no words. His snowy hair and rugged forehead, hard-set mouth and lifted arm, were enough to show his meaning. The gallant, being so skilled of fence, thought to play with this old man as he had played with his daughter; but the Guelders axe cleft his curly head, and spilt what little brain it takes to fool a trusting child.

So, in early life, deceiver and deceived were quit of harm; and may ere now have both found out whether it is wiser to inflict or suffer injury.

"THE TIRED ATTENDANT."

This picture, by Mr. F. Huard, carries us back to the romantic days of the fifteenth century. The scene is the dining-hall of some old baronial castle. There has been feast and revelry in the hall—feast and revelry which began probably at noon, the old dinner hour—and has been continued till night, perhaps far on into night, for we know not how long that "tired attendant" has been napping. By the inquiring look of the faithful, sagacious hound, and by the few faint embers on the hearth, which, in their expiring flicker, make the old hall frown so desolately, and the fire-dogs' grin doubly grotesque, we should say that the poor page has been long sleeping the sleep of exhaustion. During all those hours he has been dancing attendance on his mistress; during all those hours he has been singing, to enliven the carousing company, ditties of love and war and wine, and twanging accompaniments thereto; we see his lute and illuminated music-books lying by his side. It was not an altogether pleasant time—those old "romantic days"—for any attendant; the suit and service would not have suited our modern helps, only they would not have dared to give notice. The poor page, though of gentle degree, probably fared little better than the low-born menial or varlet, whatever poets may say to the contrary; and even the sons and daughters of Baron bold and "proude ladye" were submitted to indignities which, in these degenerate days, no pater or materfamilias would dream of or dare to inflict.

"GREYFRIARS BOBBY."

The inhabitants of Edinburgh are well acquainted with the story of this faithful dog, which attended its master's funeral, and continued four years afterwards to be a constant mourner at his grave in Greyfriars churchyard. Lady Burdett-Coutts, the benevolent patroness of the Society for the Protection of Animals, has erected a monumental fountain in memory of "Greyfriars Bobby," at the corner of George IV. Bridge and Candlemaker-row. The structure is 7 ft. in height; its material is a beautiful red granite from Westmorland. The base consists of an octagonal basin 3 ft. in diameter, which, being raised only a few inches above the ground, affords a drinking-place for dogs. From its centre rises a cylindrical column of polished granite, 2 ft. high and 20 in. in diameter, terminating in a moulding on which rests the principal basin of the fountain. This is circular, modelled after a classic vase, its diameter is between 3 ft. and 4 ft. A second column, 18 in. high and 12 in. in diameter, rises out of the upper basin, and supports a bronze sitting figure of Bobby, the faithful dog. On the lower column is a bronze plate recording the facts of the dog's history. The upper column displays, also in bronze, the arms of Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and those of the city of Edinburgh, with suitable inscriptions. Mr. Brodie is the sculptor of this work. Our illustration is from a photograph by Mr. P. Lothian, of George-street, Edinburgh.

THE LATE MR. PARRIS.

We noticed last week the death of Mr. E. T. Parris, historical painter to her late Majesty the Queen Dowager, at the advanced age of eighty-two. He was esteemed by contemporary artists and by his private friends both as a most amiable man and a highly-gifted artist. His labours extended over more than half a century, and were of an extremely varied character. Among his best known works may be mentioned his celebrated picture of the coronation of her Majesty the Queen, which was painted and engraved for the late Sir Francis Moon, Bart. For this picture her Majesty favoured Mr. Parris with sittings. He also re-painted and restored Sir James Thornhill's paintings in the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral. The flying scaffold and other mechanical arrangements for this dangerous work were designed and constructed by Mr. Parris himself. An illustration showing Mr. Parris on the scaffold engaged in his work appeared in the Illustrated London News of December 24, 1853. There were three platforms, one above another, supported by horizontal poles resting at one end upon the cornice, and suspended at the other by wire ropes from the cupola, at the height of 160 feet. His panorama of London, at the Colosseum, Regent's Park, which was, we believe, the largest picture ever painted on canvas, was a marvellous work for effect and accuracy. It has given delight to thousands in London; but it was lately purchased and taken to New York for exhibition in a building erected there on purpose to receive it. His smaller works are to be found in numberless collections. Even those executed within the last year of his life prove that old age could not yet rob the artist's hand of its skill, but that his powers were rather matured than impaired.

The portrait is engraved from a photograph by Messrs. James Russell and Sons, of Chichester.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-Boat Institution was held on Thursday week, when rewards amounting to £218 were voted to the crews of various life-boats of the institution for services rendered during recent storms. Various rewards were likewise granted to the crews of shore-boats for saving life from wrecks on our coasts, and payments to the amount of £1300 were ordered to be made on different life-boat establishments. Several contributions to the institution were announced, including £700 from a lady to defray the cost of a life-boat station.

ASHANTEE MESSENGERS OF PEACE.

WOMEN OF ANNAMABOE COOKING.

Our Extra Supplements for the last two weeks have been filled with a descriptive and historical account of Ashantee and the British settlements in West Africa, and of the transactions which led to the present war. Views of Cape Coast Castle, Elmina, Accra, and other places on the coast, with illustrations of native character, dress, and manners, have been furnished by many of our correspondents who had resided or travelled in that country. We have also been greatly obliged since the first outbreak of hostilities at Midsommer, by the useful voluntary contributions, from naval and military officers there, of sketches representing the actions which have taken place under their personal observation. Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, who left this country by the African mail steam-ship Volta, from Liverpool, on the 6th ult., has before this time landed on the Gold Coast, and we expect shortly to receive from him a constant supply of sketches, expressly designed for this Journal, which will form a complete series of Illustrations. In the mean time we are indebted again to a distinguished officer of her Majesty's naval service for the Illustration now engraved of the bombardment and burning of Bootry, on Oct. 28. Bootry, three miles east of Dix Cove, was chastised by Commander Percy Luxmoore, aided by Lieutenants John Hext and Young, with the boats of H.M.S. Argus, sloop, and H.M.S. Decoy, gun-boat, and with a force of small-arm men and marines, a shore rocket party, a few negro soldiers of the 2nd West India Regiment, under Lieutenant Wilkins, and some negro policemen, under Captain Thompson. Bootry was the chief village of a district under the influence of the Ashantees, and had given much annoyance to the loyal people of Dix Cove. Beginning at six in the morning, with a heavy fire of shell from the ships at 800 yards' distance, Commander Luxmoore took in his boats to shore, where a party, under Lieutenants Hext and Young, landed and set fire to the "town," covered by Captain Thompson with the police and marines. A continual fire was meanwhile kept up from the rocket-boats and guns, to prevent the enemy gathering in the bush, the Decoy at the same time firing up the river, where most of them had gone. None of our side were even wounded. In the sketch here engraved we see the burning "town" or village; the old abandoned British fort appears in the centre. On the left are the paddle-box boats of the Argus firing into the dense bush; and to the right the ships and rocket-boats are firing up the river and into the bush. The entrance to the river is over the right-hand rocket-boat. The men on the beach are the covering party of small-arm men. It had been arranged with the loyal native chief or "king" of Dix Cove that he would march on Bootry by land, but when the ships moved off he was attacked by overwhelming numbers, and had to retreat to Dix Cove.

Extract of a letter from the Ven. Mr. Hurst, Vicar of Collierly, than whom there is no clergyman better known or more respected in the diocese of Durham, on account of his urbanity and eloquence as a scholar:—"I have carefully read over your treatise, and, from sad experience, endorse every word of it. For some time previous my stomach retained very little food. I was really starving in the midst of plenty. Your discovery has saved my life. I can now digest my food with ease. I owe you a debt of gratitude I shall never be able to discharge." Dr. Edwards, Dartford, writes:—"Your treatise contains sound, practical common-sense, an element which is not always found pervading the pages of medical works. I wish you every possible success in your efforts for medical progress and enlightenment." The brochure is well worth perusal.—"Newcastle Daily Chronicle." "The title of the work scarcely gives an idea of the variety of subjects treated in it. It is remarkably free from empiricism, and is certainly cheap at a shilling."—"Northern Review." C. EVO.

COLLISION BETWEEN THE VILLE DU HAVRE AND THE LOCHEARN.

national right? It is not by running counter to popular opinion and sentiment—more especially when they have passed into the form of popular determination—that statesmen of second-rate or third-rate abilities can keep within their hands the power to control the nation. When it comes to a contest between a small minority and an immense majority, no schemes by which the former would withhold from the latter what they reasonably demand can be successful. The Duc de Broglie has persuaded the National Assembly to appoint a President for seven years; he has, to a large extent, weeded from Republicanism the Prefectures of all the departments; he has interfered with the free action of municipalities and with the free expression of opinion by the public press; but he has gained nothing, not a single step in advance, by his overbearing domination. Neither is it likely that he will do so by any practicable change in the law of elections. The constituencies have already got beyond that stage of plasticity which can be turned to account at will by any statesman. If the French people will but continue to eschew all illegal weapons, and will persist in using those only which the Constitution puts within their reach, they will assuredly, and at no very distant period, frustrate all the intrigues of designing politicians and will lay for themselves a broad and enduring foundation of liberty and order.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Louis of Hesse and Princess Beatrice, drove to Cumberland Lodge, Windsor Park, on Wednesday week, and visited Prince and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein. Prince Louis of Hesse returned to Windsor Castle from visiting Prince Leopold at Oxford. Mr. Theodore Martin arrived at the castle. His Excellency the German Ambassador and Countess Olga Münster, and the Lord Chamberlain and Viscountess Sydney dined with her Majesty. On the following day Mr. Theodore Martin dined with the Queen. Yesterday (Friday) week her Majesty held a Council, at which were present Lord Aberdeen, the Right Hon. R. Lowe, and Viscount Sydney. Sir John Coleridge and Dr. Lyon Playfair were sworn in members of the Privy Council. Sir Arthur Helps was Clerk of the Council. The Queen conferred the dignity of knighthood upon Mr. Henry James, Mr. William Vernon Harcourt, Vice-Chancellor Charles Hall, Mr. Archibald Paull Burt (Chief Justice of Western Australia), and Mr. Henry Doyle (Chief Justice of the Bahama Islands). Her Majesty, Princess Louis of Hesse, and Princess Beatrice were present at the christening, by the Dean of Windsor, of the infant daughter of Mr. Archibald Brown, one of the personal attendants on the Prince Consort. The ceremony took place at the residence of the parents, Windsor. The child was named Victoria. Prince Louis of Hesse went to Aldershot Camp on a visit to Prince Arthur. The Hon. Mary Lascelles and Mr. Theodore Martin left the castle. Prince and Princess Christian, the Dean of Westminster and Lady Augusta Stanley, and the Right Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair dined with her Majesty. The Hon. Flora Macdonald left the castle. On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louis of Hesse and Princess Beatrice, drove to New Lodge and visited M. and Madame van de Weyer. The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, and Prince Louis of Hesse arrived at the castle. Lady Augusta Stanley dined with her Majesty. Sunday was the twelfth anniversary of the death of the lamented Prince Consort. The Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Arthur, and Prince Leopold went to the mausoleum at eleven o'clock, when a special service was performed by the Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor, assisted by the Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster. Sir George Elvey, Mus. D., and a portion of the choir of St. George's Chapel performed the musical portion of the ceremony. By her Majesty's command the mausoleum was kept open for three hours after the service for the members of the Royal household, including the servants resident within the castle and their families, and most of the Royal tradesmen in the town, to visit it. Divine service was performed in the private chapel of the castle, at twelve o'clock, by the Rev. H. J. Ellison, Vicar of Windsor. The Dean of Westminster and Lady Augusta Stanley dined with her Majesty. On Monday the Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Arthur left the castle. The Dean of Westminster and Lady Augusta Stanley, Lady Emma Osborne, and Sir Howard Elphinstone dined with the Queen. On Tuesday Prince Leopold came to London, returning to the castle in the evening. Lady Emma Osborne and Sir Howard Elphinstone left the castle. Her Majesty's dinner party included Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Prince Leopold, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn and Lady Georgiana Hamilton, the Marchioness of Ely, and the Earl of Breadalbane. On Wednesday the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn and Lady Georgiana Hamilton, and the Dean of Westminster and Lady Augusta Stanley, left the castle. Princess Mary of Baden (Duchess Dowager of Hamilton) and the Princess of Monaco visited the Queen, and remained to luncheon. The Empress Eugénie paid her Majesty a visit on Thursday afternoon. Her Majesty, with the members of the Royal family, has driven out daily. The Court has arrived at Osborne House, Isle of Wight, to pass the Christmas. Lady Waterpark has succeeded Viscountess Clifden as Lady in Waiting; and the Hon. Horatia Stopford has arrived as Maid of Honour in Waiting to the Queen. THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales left Blenheim Palace on Saturday last. During their Royal Highnesses' stay with the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough the Princess visited the Vice-Chancellor and Mrs. Liddell at the Deanery, Christ Church, Oxford, where Prince Leopold met her Royal Highness and afterwards drove her to his residence, Wykeham House. The bells of the cathedral were rung. The Princess afterwards returned to Blenheim. The Prince had excellent sport shooting, and a small dance was given by the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough in honour of their Royal guests. The Prince and Princess joined the Royal family circle at Windsor Castle upon the anniversary of the Prince Consort's death, and returned on Monday to Marlborough House. On Tuesday their Royal Highnesses left town on a visit to Lord Rendlesham at Rendlesham Hall. The Prince and Princess travelled by the Great Eastern Railway to Ipswich, where they were met by Lord Rendlesham. The Mayor and Corporation of the town were in attendance, and an address was presented; Miss Chevallier, daughter of the Mayor, also presented a bouquet to the Princess. At the conclusion of their Royal Highnesses' visit they will proceed to Sandringham, where they will pass Christmas. The Prince has sent presents of game to the Westminster, St. George's, and other hospitals.

The Duke of Edinburgh went to the Gaiety Theatre on Wednesday evening. His Royal Highness, on Thursday, laid the first stone of the National Training-School for Music, on the west side of the Royal Albert Hall.

Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, on Saturday last, distributed the prizes given by the Art and Science Department of the Committee of Council on Education. The ceremony took place at the Townhall, Windsor. Prince and Princess Christian left Cumberland Lodge, on Monday, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Dudley, at Witley Court.

The Empress Eugénie visited the Duchess Dowager of Hamilton and the Princess of Monaco at Holland House, Kensington, on Tuesday. The Duchess of Hamilton and the Princess of Monaco paid a visit to the Empress Eugénie and the Prince Imperial, last Saturday, at Camden House, Chiselmurst.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Lady Constance Moreton, daughter of the Earl and Countess of Ducie, and Mr. George Shaw Lefevre, M.P. for Reading.

The marriage of Miss Grace Osborne, second daughter of Mr. Bernal Osborne, M.P. for Waterford, with the Duke of St. Albans, will take place in the first week in January, at her father's residence in Ireland.

The marriage of Mr. Bellingham and Lady Constance Noel, daughter of the Earl of Gainsborough, is fixed to take place at Exton House, on Jan. 13.

THE LATE COLLISION AT SEA.

The terrible disaster of the loss of the French Atlantic steamship Ville du Havre, with more than 220 lives, by a collision with the sailing-ship Lochearn, of Glasgow, was described and commented upon in this Journal a fortnight ago. Our Artist sent to Cardiff to meet the survivors when they landed was able to get from one of them, André Ernault, who is the only survivor of the watch on duty at the time of the collision, materials for the illustration engraved on our front page. It will be remembered how this deplorable accident took place, off the Azores, a little before two o'clock in the morning, on the night before Saturday, the 22nd ult. The Ville du Havre had left New York seven days before, on her voyage to the port of Havre-de-Grace, with 141 passengers and a cargo of wheat, cotton, grease, and skins; her officers and crew were 172 in number, making 313 persons on board. She was under the command of Captain Marius Surmonte. There had been a heavy fog during two or three days before the collision, but on the night when it happened the weather was very clear and fine. Most of the eighty-nine first-class passengers were American ladies and gentlemen, with their children, going to Paris for a pleasure trip. The captain had retired to his berth, leaving the ship in charge of the second officer. The Lochearn, which was commanded by Captain Robertson, had also been left in charge of her second officer, Mr. Boldchild. The most intelligible account of the collision is given by Alcide Lalauze, who was one of the French stewards on board the ill-fated ship. He says, "The night was clear and starlight, but there was no moon shining. We had our head-sails and topsails set, and were going before the wind at about twelve knots an hour. I went to bed at about half-past nine, and was awake by the collision. I immediately rushed on deck, saw the Lochearn astern of us and heard some one call out that we were sinking. I went back to my bunk, for the purpose of putting on a pair of pants, and found it already up to my knees in water. On returning to the deck I went to help get one of the long boats over the side. The passengers were all rushing backward and forward, some crying, 'Save me! save me!' while others fell down and prayed. They were all so excited that we could do scarcely anything. I tried to help some of the sailors to get a boat off, but the passengers were all jumping into it and frustrating our efforts. As soon as our ship began to fill she commenced to lean over on the port side. This, I think, accounts for the snapping of the mainmast, which brought down the mizenmast with it. The captain just happened to come out of his room before the collision took place, and as soon as he opened his door he saw the Lochearn's jibboom over the bulwarks. After going on the bridge he made every endeavour to keep the people quiet and to get the boats over, but the passengers all seemed so terror-stricken that we could do nothing scarcely. It was fearful to see the women and children running about the deck crying and entreating us to save them. We did all we could for them, but the time was so short that that all was very little. As soon as I saw her going below water I jumped off the rail astern and swam towards the Lochearn. The cries of the struggling people behind me I never, never can forget, and I seem to hear them now ringing wildly in my ears. After being in the water a few minutes I got hold of a buoy, which enabled me to keep afloat for nearly an hour, when I was picked up by one of the Lochearn's boats. From what I have heard I should think the Lochearn was seen five or six minutes before she struck us." The Ville du Havre sank in about fifteen minutes, but two of her boats, with the boats of the Lochearn, saved eighty-seven of the persons on board her. They were transferred, at noon of the next day, to the American ship Trimountain, Captain Urquhart, which brought them safely to Cardiff. The Lochearn, on her part, was so much damaged by the collision that it is a wonder how she kept afloat; her bowsprit was knocked quite out of the keel, and the entire bow of the vessel was shattered, being crushed flat, so that she would have filled and gone down but for a bulkhead 25 ft. aft of the stem. In this condition she was unable to sail a mile, but drifted 210 miles, until the 28th, when she was met by another ship, the British Queen, Captain Masters, bound from Philadelphia to Antwerp. This was in mid-ocean, 1300 miles from land. The crew and officers, with two passengers, thirty-three in all, were then glad to quit the Lochearn and seek refuge on board the British Queen, which brought them to Plymouth on Saturday, the 6th inst. The Lochearn was left to founder at sea. Both the French Government and the Board of Trade in Great Britain have instituted official inquiries, to find out who was in fault, and what was the cause of this lamentable affair, which has occasioned much distress at New York among the families of the passengers drowned.

THE CHURCH.

Dr. Harold Browne, the new Bishop of Winchester, was, last week, enthroned in the cathedral of his diocese, in the presence of a large number of the clergy and laity.

Under the direction of Sir Gilbert Scott, R.A., the fine old chancel of Owston church, near Doncaster, has been thoroughly restored at the expense of P. B. Davies-Cooke, Esq., the patron and lay rector, and of Mrs. Davies-Cooke.

Dr. Tristram gave judgment, on Monday, in the famous baldacchino case, against the Vicar and churchwardens of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, refusing their application and condemning them in costs.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, on Wednesday morning, consecrated the enlarged and restored Church of Holy Trinity, Sittingbourne, Kent, where manufactories and brickfields have brought a large population. His Grace preached the sermon.

The Norfolk Chronicle reports the restoration of Pulham St. Mary's Church, through the exertion of the Rector, the Rev. Spencer Fellows, who has raised £1600 amongst his friends and parishioners—£800 more being required to complete the work.

The Bishop of Hereford laid the foundation-stone of a new church, on Thursday week, in the parish of St. Giles, Cambridge. The ceremony was succeeded by a dinner in the hall of Magdalen College, presided over by the master, the Hon. and Rev. L. Neville.

Dr. Woodford's consecration as Bishop of Ely was performed in Westminster Abbey, on Sunday, the Primate and the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, and Ripon officiating. The sermon was preached by the Archdeacon of Berkshire. The new Bishop performed his first official act in his diocese on Tuesday, when he consecrated the church in the newly-formed parish of St. Mary, at March, in the Isle of Ely.

A good work has recently been carried out at Loxton parish church, near Weston-super-Mare. The interior of the church used to be unsightly and uncomfortable, being fitted with high, old-fashioned, straight-backed pews, and the passages being of common paving, not very dry. All this has happily been changed by the exertions and at the sole expense of Mr. Henry F. Tiarks, the patron of the living.

On the 12th inst. the chancel of St. Luke's parish church, Leek, was reopened by the Bishop of the diocese. The church, which is in the Decorated style, was built about thirty years ago, and, but for a short and poorly-fitted chancel, was above the average of buildings of that period. The chancel has now been extended ten feet eastward, repaved, and furnished with a reredos, stalls, and sedilia, from the designs of Mr. Sedding.

The formal celebration of the completion of the rebuilding of the parish church and tower of St. Marychurch, Torquay, took place recently, and was duly observed by special services at the church and a public dinner at the Assembly-rooms afterwards, at which the Vicar, the Rev. D. Fearon, presided. The foundation of the restored church was laid in August twenty-one years ago, and from that time to last year the work of renewal has been going on, until it is now pronounced complete.

The Bishop of Chester consecrated a church, to be known as St. Margaret's, Anfield, on Nov. 25. The building, which equals the finest churches in the neighbourhood, is erected by a private gentleman. Well known in Liverpool circles, Alderman Preston, the founder, will henceforth be known to the Church at large. It was not God's will that he should be spared to see his noble work completed; but, under the personal superintendence of his son, the father's wishes have been carried out. The church is situated at the junction of West Derby-road and Belmont-road, near a large population.

The parish church of St. Andrew Backwell, which contains many interesting features, including a tower, which is notable even among the many noble towers of Somersetshire, was in a very dilapidated state, when, two years ago, the restoration was begun under the direction of Mr. Street, R.A. The ancient oak screens inclosing the chancel and chapels have been very carefully repaired; carved oak stalls have been provided for the choir; and a beautiful reredos by Earp, representing the crucifixion, fills the space above the altar. The pulpit is of richly carved oak, upon a stone base. A new font fills up the space eastward of the lower arch, which is of lofty proportions. The reopening of the church took place on the 25th ult.

The ancient parish church of Seale, Surrey, upon which, within the last thirteen years, more than £2000 has been laid out, in addition to the building of a parsonage house, and also a new church, schools, and parsonage in the hamlet of Tongham, has, during the past few months, received further improvements. The central tower has been raised ten feet for the construction of a ringers' chamber, and crowned with a new roof; the bells have been increased in number from three to six; and a south transept built to receive the organ. The last-named addition is the gift of a parishioner, the cost of the other works being defrayed by general contributions. The outlay on the entire new works is about £800. All has been completed without the suspension of Divine service on a single occasion.

A window of stained glass, by Messrs. O'Connor and Taylor, has been put up in the church at Saxmundham, as a memorial of her two sons, by Mrs. Long, of Hurts Hall. The design, which is of a highly studied character, is by the Marchioness of Waterford, the subject being the "Ascension of our Lord," and the tracery, which is of the Perpendicular style of architecture, being filled in with angels. A stained-glass window has been recently placed in the Church of St. Andrew, Netherton, bearing the following inscription:—"This window is erected by the parishioners and other friends to the glory of God and to the memory of Blanche Skidmore, of Netherton-hill House, in grateful acknowledgment of her munificent gifts to the church and her numberless acts of kindness and charity to the poor."

The Church of St. Mary, Ewshott, in the district of Church Crookham, Hants, was consecrated, on the 1st inst., by the Bishop of Winchester. A site having been given by Mr. T. L. Johnston, the Vicar of Crookham (the Rev. G. Powell) employed Mr. J. O. Scott to erect a church, with sittings for 130 people, at a cost of about £2000. The requisite sum has been raised, within about £150, by subscriptions from all classes; the principal contributors, besides the Vicar, being the Rev. G. E. D. de Vitre, Mr. C. Lefroy, Mr. E. M. Parker, and Miss Bourne. The reredos, a beautifully-executed work in marble and alabaster (by Messrs. Farmer and Brindley), is a gift from Captain Lowndes in memory of his wife, a daughter of Mrs. G. A. Crawley, who has herself provided the communion plate. The Bishop was celebrant and preacher.

At a public meeting held yesterday week, at Bristol, it was agreed to support at least three scholarships for the blind of Bristol at the Normal College for the Blind, Norwood.

Craven Lodge, the residence of Mr. J. Conpland, master of the Quorn foxhounds, has been sold by private treaty to Mr. Younger, the brewer, of Edinburgh, for £14,000.

THE WAR ON THE GOLD COAST.

A BUSH WOMAN.

A-HANTEES

A BELLE OF CAPE COAST CASTLE.

The news from Cape Coast Castle to Nov. 17, which reached us on Monday, was such as to show, yet more forcibly than before, the imminent need of reinforcements of European troops for Sir Garnet Wolseley's operations against the Ashantees. The General, who had been laid up a few days on board H.M.S. Simoom with the ordinary fever of the West African coast, was still unable to push his advantage gained over the enemy till he should have received the additional forces then on their way from England. There was, indeed, a rumour, not yet verified, that an army of 25,000 Ashantees had been outflanked and surrounded in the vicinity of the Prah. The Ashantees were said to be hemmed in by a semicircular cordon of native troops, consisting of the 2nd West India Regiment, a body of Houssas, and a large force of Koossos, our new allies from Sierra Leone, the remainder of the encircling army being composed of Fantees. The problem, therefore, seemed to be whether the Ashantees would cut their way through the opposing forces back towards Coomassie, or whether they could be held in their position until the arrival of the British troops, or driven still further towards the coast. Meanwhile, reports had come in to Cape Coast Castle by native messengers to the effect that King Koffi Calalli, having heard of the position of his army, had left Ashantee for the Prah at the head of 60,000 men, and was determined to liberate the 25,000 warriors who were shut out from Coomassie. At Cape Coast Castle a very high opinion is said to be entertained of the fighting powers of the Ashantees, and the arrival of reinforcements of British troops was anxiously looked for.

The Fantees of Cape Coast Castle have proved themselves arrant cowards; they are to be disarmed and employed as labourers. It is satisfactory now to hear that the troop-ships Himalaya and Tamar, with the 23rd (Royal Welsh) Fusiliers, the Rifle Brigade, and detachments of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, have arrived at Cape Coast Castle.

We present a few more illustrations of the figures and costumes of the native people, whose condition was fully described in our preceding articles upon this subject. These Engravings of a bush woman, a town woman of Cape Coast Castle, and a couple of fighting men, are copied from photographs lent us by Mr. James Irvine, F.R.G.S., of Birkenhead. He got them in 1869, at Cape Coast Castle, from the photographer there, who is a native of Sierra Leone. Mr. Irvine lately gave an in-interesting lecture upon the Ashantee war to the Birkenhead Literary and Scientific Society.

A description of the dress provided by our Government for the British soldiers employed on the Gold Coast, and to be worn instead of their regimental uniform, appeared in our paper three weeks ago. It included the head-curtain or veil attached to the Indian helmet of pith and canvas, to be used occasionally for protection against the mosquitoes, sand-flies, and other noxious insects of that country. This curtain, invented by Major Sydney Millett, of the 23rd (Royal Welsh) Fusiliers, consists of a gauze bag mounted on two light hoops of elastic steel, which may be either drawn up and rolled around the top of the helmet, like an Indian "puggaree," or may have its lower hoop let down, so as to cover the face and neck. It will be found a great comfort in sleeping at night, as shown in the illustration.

Major W. O. Carille's sketches of life on board a troopship, though not actually taken, upon this occasion, from the transports now engaged in carrying our soldiers to West Africa, have yet a special interest at the present time. The regulations and habits of daily experience in such voyages were detailed in our former notices. For the prevention of irregularities and excess in drink, and for the preservation of health, the men are subjected to very stringent rules; and it is the duty of their officers to see these rules enforced. A gill of rum, mixed with two gills of water, is given to each man after dinner. He must either drink it at once, or leave it, when it is thrown overboard. The men have to show their bare hands and feet to the medical officer daily, to see that there is no skin disease or scurvy.

The steam-ship Thames, which is the thirteenth hired transport sent to the Gold Coast for this war, not reckoning the troopships Himalaya and Tamar, or the Dromedary, which belongs to Government, left England at the end of last week. She carries large quantities of ammunition, provisions, and clothing, with a hundred men of the Royal Marines and about twenty officers. The troop-deck and the cabins are comfortably fitted up and well ventilated. The dietary scale for the troops is exhibited between decks. It provides that each man shall be allowed daily 12 oz. of salt pork, salt beef, or preserved meat; 6 oz. of flour or its equivalent in peas, 12 oz. of biscuit (on four days every week and 1 lb. of fresh bread on the other three days, 2 oz. of preserved potatoes, a pint of porter or half a gill of spirits, 2 oz. of sugar, and $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. of tea. Once a week there is an extra ration of 4 oz. of rice, and twice a week raisins and extra sugar for a pudding. Each man is also allowed per week 2 oz. of salt, 6 oz. of pickles, and a quantity of vinegar, mustard, and pepper. Temperance men may have an additional allowance of tea and sugar in lieu of beer or spirits, or they may have credit for a penny per day if they prefer it. Cases of preserved sausages, similar to those on which the German army mainly subsisted during the late campaign, are sent for the use of the troops engaged in the expedition.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Thursday, Dec. 18.

The excitement relating to the Bazaine procès is gradually passing away. The commutation of the sentence of death and military degradation before the ranks to twenty years' detention in a fortress and dismissal from the army has been quietly accepted by all parties save the Bonapartists, which maintains it to be an aggravation of the original judgment. The Ministry are still busy devising how best to stifle the Republican sentiment of the country, and the deliberations of the Commission of Thirty charged with mutilating the existing Constitution pursue their wearisome course. In the meanwhile France has once more affirmed her aversion to her present rulers, and—for the third time since the Parliamentary revolution of May 24, which placed Marshal MacMahon and the Duc de Broglie at the head of affairs—the provincial elections have resulted in a great Republican victory. On Sunday last MM. Bonnel, Marcou, Swiney, and Calmon, the Republican candidates in the departments of the Aude, Finistère, and Seine-et-Oise, were elected members of the National Assembly by overwhelming majorities. In the Aude, MM. Bonnel and Marcou polled nearly 70,000 votes, against 45,000 distributed among the four Monarchical candidates; and in benighted Finistère, where the clergy are supposed to reign supreme, M. Swiney obtained 61,376 votes, against 42,592 given to M. Leguen; while the hotly-contested struggle in Seine-et-Oise resulted in the nomination of M. Calmon by a majority of some 17,000 votes.

The recent successes of the Government in the National Assembly are more than counterbalanced by this great electoral defeat, the significance of which, almost on the morrow of the prolongation of Marshal MacMahon's powers, cannot be over-estimated. The success of the Republican candidates on Nov. 16 was ascribed to the miserable blunders of M. Boulé, then Minister of the Interior; but to-day the Duc de Broglie holds that post himself, and is not more fortunate than his predecessor. The strong and durable government which France was asserted to be so much in need of meets everywhere with the opposition of public opinion; and in order to assure the triumph of their cause the Royalist journals are compelled to demand the restriction of every liberty, while the Bonapartists counsel the nomination of the préfets who were so successful in securing the election of the official candidates of the Empire. As for the Legitimists, their champion, M. de Belcastel, calls for the abolition of universal suffrage and the grant of double, treble, and even quadruple votes to certain Conservative electors.

About a mile from the coast of Provence, in front of the Point de la Croisette, which separates the Gulfs of Napoule and Juan, in the vicinity of Cannes, rise the islands of Ste. Marguerite and St. Honorat, to the first of which, rendered for ever celebrated by the sojourn of the Man with the Iron Mask, Marshal Bazaine is shortly to be removed. Immediately after pronouncing their terrible sentence, the Duc d'Aumale and his colleagues addressed a petition to the Minister of War begging him to intercede with the President of the Republic on behalf of the ex-commander of the Army of the Rhine. Marshal MacMahon, whom this step placed in an embarrassing position, at once conferred with his Ministers, and not merely commuted the sentence of death, but decided upon sparing Marshal Bazaine the deeply humiliating ceremony invariably attending military degradation, although in principle that part of the sentence is to have effect. Upon the President's decision being communicated to the prisoner (who had previously written to his counsel, Maître Lachaud, thanking him for the manner in which he had conducted his defence and expressing the conviction that his conduct would be justified in after times) he wrote to Marshal MacMahon in the following terms:—"You have remembered the time when we served our country side by side; but I fear that the kind feeling of your heart has prevailed over reasons of State. I should have died without regret; for the petition for a commutation addressed to you by my judges avenges my honour"—a piece of sophistry which may console the ex-Marshal and his partisans, but will impose on no one else.

One of the most curious circumstances in connection with the Tristan case célèbre is the interest which M. Thiers appears to have taken in the prisoner, whose conduct he has always steadily defended. The newspapers published a letter from M. Lachaud to the ex-President thanking him for the sympathy and advice with which he had supported and encouraged him during the trial, and concluding with the following words:—"Sad experience has already taught France the depth of your insight and the wisdom of your counsels. The future will show that in the present instance your judgment was not at fault." The prisoner, who, on receiving the news of his sentence, merely expressing surprise at the fact that he had been unanimously condemned, is to be allowed to have his wife and family with him at the Ile Ste. Marguerite. The costs of the trial, which he will have to defray, amount to over £20,000; and it is rumoured that when these are paid he will have very little money left, having dissipated almost the whole of the enormous fortune he acquired in Mexico previous to the war of 1870.

The National Assembly has been occupied throughout the week in discussing next year's Budget, having engaged in only one debate of any interest. The recent commutation of Marshal Bazaine's sentence has led the Republican party to call the attention of the Chamber to the condition of the Communists transported to New Caledonia, scores of whom, it is said, are dying every month, and to advocate an amnesty for all offences committed in connection with the recent Parisian insurrection. MM. Peron and Brisson succeeded, last Monday, in persuading the Assembly to take some steps with regard to the various propositions of this nature brought forward by different Republican deputies previous to the autumnal recess, and the question will in all probability soon receive a solution.

The Constitutional Committee, after appointing a sub-committee of nine to examine the question of the organisation and attributes of the executive powers, has commenced discussing the reform of the electoral law, the members of the Right vigorously attacking the principle of universal suffrage, as being dangerous to the safety of all Governments, and urging that greater influence should be given to the wealth and intelligence of the country. The committee charged with examining the new municipal law has decided upon according to the Government the right of choosing all mayors and adjoints among persons not belonging to the municipal councils, in spite of the energetic protestations of the Republican minority.

HOLLAND.

In Thursday's sitting of the Second Chamber the Minister of the Colonies stated that he had received a telegram from Lieutenant-General van Swieten, dated Penang, Dec. 17, 6.45 p.m., announcing that the fortress of Cottaperak, in the Lower Moesapi district, had been captured by the Dutch troops, with a loss of six killed and thirty-eight wounded. The enemy left eighty-five dead on the field. General van Swieten's telegram added that he was advancing up the Acheen river. A previous telegram had announced the capture of Moesapi fortress.

In consequence of the recent vote of the Second Chamber rejecting the Navy Estimates, the Minister of Marine has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted by the King. The Colonial Minister has been intrusted ad interim with the direction of the vacant Ministry.

GERMANY.

The Queen Dowager of Prussia, widow of the late King Frederick William IV., died at midnight on Sunday last, in her seventy-third year.

Herr Lasker's motion for extending the legislative jurisdiction of the Empire to all matters of civil law, thereby superseding the civil jurisdiction of the separate States, has been adopted by the Federal Council of Germany.

In the Prussian Diet, on Wednesday, Dr. Falk introduced the Civil Marriage Bill. He vindicated the compulsory principle in it as being necessary to place the relations of Church and State on a proper footing. He spoke of the investiture of clergymen with civil offices as a practical matter to which the Government attached the highest value. The bill passed the first reading. Prince Bismarck excited a burst of enthusiasm among his supporters in the Diet by declaring, in answer to taunts about his change of opinion respecting civil marriage, that he is no longer a member of a party, but a Minister of the Crown, subordinating his personal views to the policy of the State. The Lower House has passed a resolution excluding the North Schleswig deputies, Herren Ahlmann and Kryger, from participating in the business of the House until they shall have taken the oaths to the Constitution. A motion brought forward calling on the Government to return to its former principles of dealing with the Roman Catholic Church was opposed by the Government, and rejected by 283 votes to 95.

A very important step has been taken by the Bavarian Government. The decision of King Maximilian II., according to which the Bavarian Constitution had always to give way to the Concordat with the Papal See whenever their respective provisions happened to clash, has been abrogated.

The Old Catholic Bishop Reinkens, so severely condemned in the last encyclical letter of Pope Pius IX., has replied to his Holiness in a pastoral commendatory of the encyclical letter. The Bishop of Paderborn, one of the most resolute opponents of Prince Bismarck's ecclesiastical policy, has received notice of the stoppage of his salary. The Tribunal of Breslau has condemned Dr. Förster, Prince Bishop of that diocese, to a fine of 11,600 thalers, or two years' imprisonment, in contumaciam, for appointing clergymen in violation of the new ecclesiastical laws.

AMERICA.

The House of Representatives at Washington has decided, before acceding to a demand of the Treasury for an increase in taxation to the extent of about eight millions sterling, to require a statement from the Administration as to what economies can be effected in the expenditure. The House has passed a bill repealing the bankrupt law.

The Times' correspondent at Philadelphia reports that Pennsylvania has voted in favour of the adoption of the proposed new Constitution by over 150,000 majority. The Constitution was framed to deprive of power a ring of politicians controlling the State.

A Reuter's telegram from New York announces the death of Professor Agassiz. He was born in 1807, and received his early education at the Gymnasium of Bienne and the Academy of Lausanne. He afterwards studied medicine and the experimental sciences at Zurich, Heidelberg, and Munich. His works on natural history and his "Studies of Glaciers" gave him a European reputation. M. Agassiz left Europe for America in 1846, and in 1847 was appointed Professor of Zoology and Geology in the Scientific School at Cambridge, Massachusetts, which post he retained till his death. Subsequently he explored every portion of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, the valley of the Mississippi, and the great plains at the base of the Rocky Mountains. He also accompanied an exploring expedition to Brazil, and superintended an investigation of the deep-sea bottom of the Gulf Stream.

Little ceremony was observed in delivering the Virginus to

The election of a member of the House of Commons for the western division of Toronto has resulted in the return, by a large majority, of a supporter of the new Government, in place of a partisan of the late Cabinet.

INDIA.

According to a telegram from Calcutta, dated Sunday, the results of the harvest are, generally speaking, slightly better than was anticipated; but the prospects in the distressed districts are still exceedingly gloomy. The Government is steadily storing grain.

A telegram from the Viceroy of India, dated Calcutta, Dec. 15, announces that the future prospects of the crops will greatly depend on the Christmas rains. Measures have been taken to store grain in selected places. No relief works are yet considered necessary; but they can be started whenever required. Large supplies of grain are available in the north-west and the Punjab.

The welcome news is telegraphed by the Times' correspondent at Calcutta that heavy rain fell for three hours in Bengal on the 11th inst.

The same correspondent telegraphs as follows on Wednesday:—"The Viceroy, after visiting the Soane Works, has addressed to Sir G. Campbell a very warm eulogy for the excellence of his relief arrangements and appointment of officers. In Echar and Rajshaye prospects are unchanged since Sir G. Campbell's excellent circular of Nov. 17, except that more land is under spring crops and the sowings are satisfactory. The present condition of the country is the same as in December, 1865. For the future we must await the Christmas rain. The Shahabad zemindars are asking for advances. The planters are rendering great assistance. The Viceroy has under consideration a law providing that landlords should stand security for the repayment of State advances to cultivators. Private trade from the west is active. All officers are convinced that the Government orders and precautions are adequate."

Mr. Henry Vizetelly, our correspondent at Vienna during the recent Exhibition, has received, through Baron Schwarzenborne, the cross of the Order of Franz-Josef, conferred upon him by the Emperor. Mr. Daniel Tallerman and Mr. James Green have also received the cross.

A stately residence, rich in every princely luxury, as well as in architectural beauty, constructed in the style of Versailles, is shortly to rise on the banks of the romantic Chien Lake, in Bavaria. King Lewis has determined to realise what has been a secret wish of his for many years. Several of the leading German masters of architecture have been intrusted with the preparation of the designs, from which the King will select the most pleasing.

Out of a crew of three-and-twenty on board the steamer Becklow, of Newcastle, which foundered off the small island of Oliveira, near Port Lago, only one man has been saved. Before the vessel left the Thames five of the hands deserted, and their places had to be hurriedly filled at Gravesend.—From Adelaide we have news of the wreck of the Iron King, a vessel which left London, with emigrants, on the Aug. 25 for South Australia. All the emigrants were saved.—A vessel from Jamaica has arrived at Gravesend with a portion of the crew of the Arabia, which foundered on the voyage from Calcutta to Boston. It reports a considerable loss of life, including the captain of the Arabia.

VIOLENT GALE.

A terrific gale passed over the northern part of this island on Tuesday morning, with great damage to property and deplorable loss of life. Sheffield was the chief sufferer, but at Barnsley, Darlington, Dewsbury, Halifax, the Hartlepool, Leeds, Shields, Whitby, Berwick, Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Kirkcaldy, Perth, and down to the north midland counties, the gale was destructive.

At Sheffield it is reported that there is hardly a street which is not strewn with rubbish; and it is believed that there have been at least eight or ten fatal accidents, and the number of persons who have been hurt is proportionately large. In Trippet-lane an engine-chimney, 120 ft. high, fell across eight cutlery workshops, owned by Messrs. Reynolds and Son, contractors, and buried the occupants in the rooms, which had been sublet to working cutlery, and which contained thirty persons at the time of the accident. Of these six were killed and fourteen injured. At the Norfolk Works, belonging to Messrs. Thomas Firth and Sons, a chimney, 120 ft. in height, was blown across a hammer-shop and other buildings, reducing portions of them to mere heaps of rubbish. There were between thirty and forty men in the works, but, fortunately, most of them saw the chimney rocking and rushed out before it fell. Three men were injured, one of them, it is feared, fatally. A large foundry, which has only recently been erected, at Attercliffe suffered very severely. The roof of an immense shop was carried almost bodily away, and immediately afterwards the side walls fell in. All the workmen contrived to make their escape with the exception of two—Mark Rolley, a fletcher, and John Bradbury, a blacksmith. These were buried beneath the ruins. As soon as their bodies could be recovered they were taken to the infirmary, where it was found that Colley was dead. Bradbury's injuries are most serious, and it is expected they will terminate fatally. At half-past nine, at Messrs. W. Guest and Son's button manufactory, Neptune Works, Watery-lane, the engine-chimney fell, cutting the factory (a three-story building) in two parts, but the inmates escaped injury. These are only specimens of a vast number of similar catastrophes.

From a number of reports from other northern towns we find that at Barnsley some of the ornamental stonework of St. George's Church was blown away, and the chimneys of a large house opposite were knocked down. At the recently-erected Methodist new chapel a handsome stained window was destroyed. Two churches at Batley were injured, and a lady died from fright. At Leeds the belfry of St. Joseph's Church went through the roof and damaged the organ. The Church Institute was also greatly damaged.

It appears from the weekly return of metropolitan pauperism that the total number of paupers last week was 104,340, of whom 36,234 were in workhouses and 68,106 received outdoor relief. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 634, of whom 472 were men, 133 women, and 29 children under sixteen.

A deputation from the Birmingham Licensed Victuallers' League and the London Protection Society had an interview with Mr. Lowe last Saturday, in which they asked that the hours of closing public-houses might be taken out of the hands of the magistrates and fixed by Parliament, and that uniform hours should be decided on for the whole country, suggesting from 5 a.m. till 12 p.m. on week days, and from 12 a.m. till 1.30 p.m., and from 6 p.m. until 11 p.m. on Sundays, should be the periods during which public-houses may be legitimately opened. Mr. Lowe, in reply, said that he did not think the question could be taken up next Session, and that his views were not in accordance with those of the deputation; while, at the same time, he expressed a decided opinion that people could not be made sober by Act of Parliament.

At a meeting of the Chemical Society recently held—Dr. Frankland, F.R.S., vice-president, in the chair—a paper, entitled "Mineralogical Notices," by Professor Story-Maskelyne and Dr. W. Flight, was read by the former, treating of the composition of caledonite and lanarkite. Mr. John Williams then exhibited some fine specimens of crystallised phosphorous acid and metallic phosphites, and gave a short account of their reactions. After which Professor Church made a communication to the society on the composition of the mineral autunite. Professor Lawrence Smith, of the United States, while describing a modification of the Bunsen gas-burner employed by him for heating the crucible in determinations of the alkalis in silicious minerals, gave a short sketch of the process he had devised for that purpose. In the course of the evening a gas-burner by Mr. Fletcher, of Warrington, was exhibited.

A paper by Sir Rowland Hill on the high price of coal was read at a meeting of the Statistical Society. To check the great waste in consumption of coal the imposition of a tax was recommended. A tax of 1s. per ton would produce six millions sterling—a sum more than sufficient for the total abolition of the income tax; and by increasing the impost a sum could be obtained large enough to justify the remission of all taxes, save those on tobacco, spirits, wine, and malt liquor. In the discussion which followed Mr. Dudley Baxter said that on an article of such prime necessity as coal the imposition of a duty would not fail to produce great discontent. A general rise in prices of almost every manufactured article would be the immediate result, and a great diminution of trade would follow. Sir James Anderson, Professor Leone Levi, and other speakers expressed similar views, and the proposition did not meet with the approval of the meeting generally.

A discovery in natural science was made known at the Royal Society on Thursday week. The chief paper was by Mr. Wm. Crookes, F.R.S. He suspended an exceedingly light lever arm of glass, about 1½ inch long, to the end of a fibre of spun glass about 8 in. long, inside a glass tube. To each end of the lever arm a disc of pith, rather smaller than a three-penny piece, was fixed. As soon as the tube was full of air, the warmth of a finger outside the tube almost instantly repelled the lever arm. When there was a vacuum of thirty millimetres, which is easily produced by a common air-pump, external heat would not move the arm. On the very perfect vacuum produced by a Sprengel pump being tried, the lever arm was repelled by the warmth from the finger. Light also attracts or deflects the lever arm under like conditions. From the days of Sir Isaac Newton it has been believed that light could not produce the mechanical motion of a lever arm in a vacuum; and this idea, based upon imperfect experiments, has been largely used by philosophers as an argument against the emission theory of light, supported by Newton. It is not really, however, the fact that the new experiments overthrow the wave theory of light, on which all the calculations as to the approach and recession of the fixed stars in relation to the solar system are based; the opposition is only apparent.

The Registrar-General's return shows that the deaths in London last week were 1759, which was 60 above the average number. The annual death-rate from all causes, which in the two previous weeks had been equal to 25 and 23 per 1000, rose last week to 27. The deaths of persons under twenty years of age were fewer than in the previous week; whereas the increase in the deaths of persons aged between twenty and sixty years was equal to 45 per cent, and at sixty years and upwards to 38 per cent. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs and phthisis, which in the five preceding weeks had steadily declined from 761 to 520, rose again last week, under the influence of the low temperature and fog, to 764, exceeding the average number by 153. The 764 last week included 364 from bronchitis, 201 from phthisis, 102 from pneumonia, 40 from asthma, and 57 from other diseases of the lungs. Compared with the numbers returned in the previous week, the largest proportional increase was shown in the fatal cases of asthma and congestion of the lungs. The deaths of a wood-engraver, aged eighty-nine years, in Islington, and of two twin infants, aged six weeks, in Whitechapel, were certified to be directly due to the fog. There were 4 deaths from smallpox, 133 from measles, 22 from scarlet fever, 8 from diphtheria, 42 from whooping-cough, 30 from different forms of fever, and 9 from diarrhoea; thus to the seven principal diseases of the zymotic class 248 deaths referred, against 232 and 237 in the two preceding weeks. Of the 30 deaths referred to fever, 3 were certified as typhus, 25 as enteric or typhoid, and two as simple continued fever. The 133 fatal cases of measles exceeded the number returned in any week since the commencement of the present epidemic, and were 91 above the average. Ten deaths from drowning were registered, but only 2 from accidents caused by horses or vehicles in the streets. The mean temperature was 33.6, or 7.5 below the average.

SCENE AT THE SAILORS' HOME.

In that most useful institution, the Sailors' Home, Wells-street, near the London Docks, which was established so long ago as 1830, 11,000 men belonging to the merchant-vessels that visit this port were last year provided with comfortable lodging and wholesome food. They pay for their board at a moderate but sufficient price, to the amount of nearly £10,000 a year collectively, leaving about £1000 to be provided by subscribers for the charges of this benevolent establishment. The model has been imitated, if not improved, by similar institutions in most of our great seaport towns. The seamen discharged from a vessel on her arrival in port have the opportunity here of passing, without too much waste of their hard-earned wages, the time which may intervene before they are taken on board another ship for a different voyage. Amusements of a healthy kind, and suitable arrangements for studying useful knowledge, are placed within the reach of those who choose to profit by them. Some will play at a harmless game, while others read the newspaper, the Bible, or some entertaining book; others, again, will write long letters to their friends; some will talk endless yarns of their adventures in distant parts of the world. Now and then, as we see in the Illustration, an expert dancer is invited to please his comrades by the exhibition of a "sailor's hornpipe." They smoke at their ease, admiring his nimble performance, which goes on to a merry tune from the harp-strings of the attendant minstrel; or, if the minstrel be a fiddler, he will do just as well.

The election for Huntingdon took place on Wednesday, when Sir John Karslake polled 499 votes, against 341 given for Mr. Arthur Arnold, thus showing a majority of 158 for the Conservative candidate.

Five persons have suffered injury through the incautious investigation by a shop porter, at Plymouth, into an escape of gas. He lighted a match close to the leak, when an explosion took place, knocking out the front of the room and burning all the goods in the place.

In replying to a deputation from the Legal Education Association, the Lord Chancellor announced that he was about to prepare a draught bill, in which he would not confine himself to carrying out the special objects of the association, but would also incorporate such changes in the constitution of the Inns of Court as had been recommended by the Royal Commission. The draught when prepared will be submitted to the Inns of Court and the various legal societies in the metropolis.

The colonelcy of the 55th Regiment is vacant by the death of General Sir Patrick Edmonstone Craigie, K.C.B., aged eighty. The deceased General entered the Army in 1813, was appointed Colonel of the 31st Foot in 1859, and transferred to the 55th Foot in June, 1862.—The colonelcy of the 107th Regiment has become vacant by the death of Lieutenant-General William James D'Urban, which took place at Newport House, near Exeter, on the 5th inst., at the age of seventy years. The deceased officer was the son of the late Sir Benjamin D'Urban, G.C.B., a distinguished Peninsula veteran. He had held the colonelcy of the 107th since August, 1863.

The Nonconformist publishes some statistics as to religious accommodation in the towns of England and Wales. It appears from them that in 125 cities and boroughs, with an aggregate population of a little over 6,500,000, the accommodation supplied by the principal religious bodies is as follows:—Church of England, 1,204,877 sittings; Wesleyans, 376,738; Congregationalists, 349,459; Baptists, 251,691; Primitive Methodists, 150,015; Roman Catholics, 147,145; United Methodists, 122,444; Presbyterians, 82,641; New Connexion Methodists, 77,558; Unitarians, 42,549; Society of Friends, 32,401; Calvinistic Methodists, 30,810; Plymouth Brethren, 22,460; Bible Christians, 10,183.

At the last meeting of the Philological Society a paper on Etruscan numerals was read by the Rev. Isaac Taylor. He stated that the long-sought key to the Etruscan language had been discovered. Two dice had been found in a tomb, having their six faces marked with words, instead of by pips. Mr. Taylor examined these six words in detail, and showed that they were identical with the first six digits belonging to the Altaic branch of the Turanian family of speech. Guided by this clue, it was easy to show that the grammar and vocabulary of the 3000 Etruscan inscriptions were also Altaic. The words denoting kindred, the pronouns, the participles, and the declensions corresponded closely with those of the Tatar tribes of Siberia. The Etruscan mythology proved to be essentially the same as that of the Kalevala, the great Finnic epic.

The Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels held its usual monthly meeting on Monday—the Earl of Romney in the chair. Grants of money were made in aid of the following objects—viz., building new churches at Blackwood, in the parish of Bedwelty, near Cardiff; Darlington, St. James's; and Martin in the parish of Timberland, near Sleaford; rebuilding the church at Colaton Raleigh, near Ottery St. Mary's; enlarging or otherwise increasing the accommodation in the churches at Affpuddle, near Dorchester; Budbrooke, near Warwick; Caversfield, near Bicester; Hibaldstow, near Brigg; Llanfairisgaer, near Carnarvon; and Llanllugan, near Shrewsbury. Under urgent circumstances the grants formerly made towards reseating and restoring the churches at Llandysul, Cardigan; Mothvey, near Llandovery; and Sandwich, St. Mary's, were each increased. Grants were also made from the School Church and Mission House Fund towards building school or mission churches at Camberwell; St. Luke's, Surrey; Gillington, St. Philip's, in the parish of Bradford; Llandaff-yard and Bermondsey, St. Saviour's, Surrey. In the multitude of other claims it is a matter of regret that the Incorporated Church Building Society should be overlooked and it is earnestly hoped that attention may be directed, and that successfully, to the numerous appeals soon likely to be made to the committee for aid and the recent very marked scarcity of donations to its funds.

"MOVING ON:" A SKETCH IN ST. JAMES'S PARK DRAWN BY L. WAGNER.

The Extra Supplement.

"THE LOST TRACK."

In this picture, which was painted by Mr. Heywood Hardy for Messrs. T. Agnew and Sons, the eminent fine-arts publishers of Manchester, the romantic novelist might find suggested for good material of the story-telling trade a situation not devoid of interest. Here is a lady, young and beautiful—at least, young and pretty—travelling alone in a well-appointed carriage, with her trunks duly packed on the roof, and probably seeking to arrive by the appointed hour at the door of a country house, where she is to be welcomed by a family party of her affectionate friends. It is a lonely and rather dreary region at this winter season, with its leafless willows on the banks of the deep and torpid stream, the dusky mass of woodland beyond the marsh on its farther side, and not a house to be seen for miles. The road should lie across this cheerless plain, but it is marked by no sheltering and guiding double line of hedgerows; and the ground is covered six inches deep with snow, in which the feet of the tired pair of horses sink up to their fetlocks. The coachman is a stranger to this part of the country, and he now confesses that he has lost his way, as the lady puts out her charming little head from the side window, to ask if he is quite sure of the road. Now if you or we, gallant young gentleman reader, happened to be riding by, mounted on our noble steed, at this very interesting moment, you or we being an eligible hero, from twenty-one to thirty years of age, the heir to a baronetcy and £10,000 a year, with a grand ancestral mansion in the neighbourhood, and a mother, sister, aunt, or other proper female housekeeper there—what a chance there would be for you or for us! "How unfortunate! but yet how fortunate that I meet you! Indeed, you cannot hope to reach Appleton Hall to-night; it is seven miles distant, and your horses are quite used up. I beg you will come to our place, just half a mile beyond that copse. My aunt, Lady Barton, will be delighted to make you comfortable for the night. I will send one of our people at once to tell Sir George Appleton that you are with us, and you can be there as early as you please to-morrow morning. No, really I cannot excuse you from coming; it will be the greatest pleasure we ever had in our dull old place. We shall find out, presently, that we know all each other's friends in town, and that we ought to have met before." Such might be the tone of our brisk address to the perplexed young lady of this picture, and who knows what might be the end of the story?

ST. JAMES'S PARK AT NIGHT.

As we sit by the warm fireside or at the plentiful table, in the evening of one of these days about Christmas-time, we do not much like to think of anybody wanting to stay all night upon a damp bench under the dripping boughs of the trees, now bared of their foliage, in St. James's Park. Yet there are such desolate and destitute persons loitering there, within a bowshot of the Queen's palace, and it is the duty of a policeman to bid them "move on;" for serious dangers to the peace and safety of her Majesty's liege subjects might be feared if people of every vagrant class were allowed to lurk in any numbers among the Westminster groves, and to remain long after dark. Such accommodation would be most convenient for the amiable pursuits of the garrotter, the burglar, and the treacherous companions, male or female, who might beset the homeward path of a careless reveller to decoy and rob, perhaps even to kill, the unwary prey they would accost with civil or seducing talk. In the good old days of the last century these practices were frequent in such places of Old London, and we have known them sometimes to be reported in the morning newspapers of our own generation. To prevent the manifold risks of evil, therefore, from the nocturnal congregation of vicious and criminal loungers in the parks, it is needful that all should be turned out and that the gates should be closed at nightfall. Some of these reluctant exiles from the inclosed public garden, which is certainly not a Garden of Eden on a foggy evening in December, might no doubt appeal to compassion by pleading that, if the world is all before them, they know not where to choose their place of rest. The casual wards of the several workhouses, indeed, are open for them till a certain hour; and the lock-up cells of the police stations, when one has qualified oneself for admission there by committing a slight offence, will be available at any time of the night. But the regular British vagrant would rather lie on the grass, soaked by the rain, than submit to the strict order of workhouse or prison.

An occurrence of a gratifying character took place on Monday, at Plymouth, when the medal of the Royal Humane Society was presented by the Bishop of Exeter, on behalf of the association, to Miss Reynolds, a young lady who, in August last, saved a young woman from drowning, by swimming out to her assistance. The presentation was made at a public meeting convened by the Mayor, Mr. Alfred Rooker.

LAW AND POLICE.

TRIAL OF THE TICHBORNE CLAIMANT FOR PERJURY.

Luie's identification was completed, on Thursday week, by the medical evidence of Dr. Burns, of the Chatham Convict Prison. The stiffness in the little finger, the moles on the back, and the hernia all corresponded with the prison record. Dr. Kenealy declined to support him further, and he was again committed to prison, and the Solicitor to the Treasury bound over to prosecute him for perjury. Counsel for the defence then continued his speech, dealing chiefly with the relations between Lady Tichborne and the defendant and her family.

Dr. Kenealy's running criticism, yesterday week, on the evidence for the prosecution bore hard on Senor Barra for what he had said to Castro about the defendant. It discovered many grounds of probability for Roger Tichborne having visited Melapilla—his writing home that he was studying Spanish, the way he had talked about his magnificent estates, and so forth. The doctor objected, parenthetically, to the Australian and other maps put in by the prosecution, that they had not been proved. Mr. Justice Lush asked if he meant to convey an imputation against the Queen's geographer, Mr. Wyld. Oh! no; but he thought that a more accurate map was to be preferred to a less accurate one. It was shown, per contra, that the prosecution had been very severe on his client's lapses of memory. Mr. Hawkins had laughed at his calling his mother "Mama" and writing "Bart." after his signature; but these peculiarities demonstrated his superiority to coaching. Even the contradictions in his client's own statements strengthened this conclusion in Dr. Kenealy's mind. He could not explain how the defendant had sworn that the Santiago likeness was taken at Southampton; but an impostor, he argued, could not afford to risk committing such an inaccuracy. His knowing the incident of the mule falling over a precipice was strongly inconsistent with imposition. The Lord Chief Justice offered to tell Dr. Kenealy how he meant to instruct the jury on that point—it had been got from Moore. After some discussion about Moore not having been called, Dr. Kenealy pronounced the Lord Chief Justice's theory "a wild speculation." From this there was a digression to the sealed packet, regarding which Dr. Kenealy accused himself of an omission for which he would never be able to forgive himself "as long as he walked this mortal earth." Mr. Hawkins had told the jury that the date of the packet was not in Roger Tichborne's handwriting. On examination his Lordship and the jury both agreed that it was. Dr. Kenealy proceeded to insinuate that Mr. Hawkins had a grave design in casting suspicion on the writing. The Lord Chief Justice observed that Mr. Hawkins had yet to be known either as a rogue or a fool, and if in this case he had been rogue enough to try to mislead the jury he would not have been fool enough to put in the document. A juror suggested another explanation—that Dr. Kenealy might assume they came from Earlswood. The doctor, however, took a sudden flight to Rio, and there drew a Bacchanalian portrait of Roger drunk at two o'clock in the morning, and getting pigeoned out of his money. He complained that the voice of the community was stifled, but he foresaw a time of retribution when these points would be agitated by many active and energetic minds. The Court objected to forestalling such great minds, as it wasted time; and Dr. Kenealy, being entreated to come to the main points himself, showed the importance of establishing that there was an Osprey in Hobson's Bay in 1854, by which Roger Tichborne might have been picked up. The Lord Chief Justice granted that if he proved this he cut away the ground from one of the strong arguments of the prosecution.

On Monday Dr. Kenealy spoke at some length upon what he termed "the Luie episode." He declared that the legal advisers of the defendant never had the slightest suspicion that the man's evidence was untrustworthy, and that his conduct subsequently to the time when he gave his evidence justified them in placing faith in him. The learned counsel explained his own share in the matter, and assured the jury that the extraordinary art, skill, and daring of the man had "deceived him, as it had deceived others." He then addressed himself to the question of the defendant's responsibility, and, while presuming that the production of Luie had undoubtedly done great and vital injury to his cause, pointed out to the jury the reasons for the defendant's belief that the story told by Luie was a genuine one. In the end, Dr. Kenealy assured the jury that if he could for a moment believe that his client had palmed off this witness upon him, knowing his antecedents, he would throw up his brief with scorn, as he had done with the Fenian, Captain Burke, on discovering that he was implicated in the Clerkenwell outrage. A question rose next about Captain Brown's alleged recognition of Luie, which the Lord Chief Justice wondered at, as the Osprey had never been at Rio in 1854. He invited information also on Luie's statement that he was led to believe that the pilot and part of the crew of the Osprey were then in London. Dr. Kenealy promised to look into this point, and concluded for the day with a protest that, if the captain of the Osprey had neglected to report his ship at Melbourne, the defendant ought not to be responsible for it.

Dr. Kenealy was engaged, on Tuesday, in pointing out the omissions of the prosecution, and showing what he thinks to be the absurd consequences of the Orton theory. There was never a case heard of, he said, where the impostor had known so little of his model, or had so little means of acquiring information. There had never, from the time of Perkin Warbeck, been an imposture so long-lived. All the eccentricities of his client became, in Dr. Kenealy's hands, proofs of his bonâ fides. Towards the close of the sitting the learned counsel digressed into his favourite field of biographical analogy. Lord Carew, Lord Peterborough, Richard Savage, Dean Swift, and other celebrated eccentrics, were portrayed in support of the doctor's argument that ordinary rules were not always to be applied to human nature.

In the course of Wednesday the learned counsel spoke of the amount of gold which he alleged was ready in this case when witnesses were wanting—a remark which elicited a rebuke from the Judges, Mr. Justice Lush observing that, after the experience of the last ten days, he listened with astonishment to these imputations. Dr. Kenealy, during his address, explained why he had not called Orton's sisters in support of his case, and reviewed at considerable length the conduct of the defendant in going to Wapping on the night of his arrival in England, in December, 1866. After luncheon Dr. Kenealy provoked another altercation with the Bench by speaking of the independence of the Bar as being imperilled.

The visit of the defendant to Wapping on Christmas Eve, 1866, formed the staple of Dr. Kenealy's address on Thursday. He said the only true way of looking at it was as the act of a brain which was not right—of a person hardly responsible for what he did. Assuming the defendant was Arthur Orton, it was conduct perfectly inconsistent with that of a cool, calculating villain like a man of that description, who had fabricated an ingenious and wicked fraud; but, on the other hand, assuming he was Roger Tichborne, a wild, headstrong, and foolish man, such conduct, being irrational, was consistent enough. Dr. Kenealy proceeded to argue that the evidence of the Wapping witnesses who had deposed that the Claimant and Arthur Orton were the same person was highly improbable, if not incredible, and occupied most of the day with disparaging comments on the Wapping witnesses called by the Crown. Dr. Kenealy pointed to the fact that most of the witnesses for the Crown could not say whether the ears of Arthur Orton were pierced or not, and the Lord Chief Justice having expressed a doubt whether a casual observer would notice it, the learned counsel said he could distinctly see the ears of the jurymen so as to say whether they were pierced or not. Whereupon he was asked by a jurymen, "Are the foreman's ears pierced?" and replied "No." Much laughter was caused by the foreman saying, "You are wrong."

Sir R. Phillimore, sitting in Chambers in the Court of Admiralty, has ordered the sum of £7050, which had been realised from the sale of the Murillo, to be paid over to the owners of the Northfleet, thus terminating the litigation.

The case of "Rose v. Denton," which occupied the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer and a special jury for six days, was brought to a close yesterday week. The plaintiff was Mr. Philip Rose, late a member of the firm of Baxter, Rose, and Norton, and the defendant was Mr. Bailey Denton, the well-known engineer. The jury having consulted a short time, the foreman said:—"We find, my Lord, a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £50; but it must not be supposed that we consider the sum as the measure of the compensation that ought to be awarded to Mr. Rose. We limit the damages to that small sum—to use the language of the Attorney-General—out of pity for an unreasonable man, who imagines that he has been injured, and because we know that Mr. Rose is so wealthy that he is not desirous of obtaining exemplary damages."

Miss Vaile, an actress, brought an action in the Exchequer Court, on Tuesday, against Mr. Herbert Merriman for breach of promise of marriage, and obtained £100 damages.

Damages to the amount of £420 have been recovered, in an action in the Queen's Bench, by Miss Hodson, lessee of the Royalty Theatre, against Mr. Tremaine, an East India merchant, for breach of agreement, he having withdrawn from his undertaking to rent the theatre for twelve weeks at £35 a week.

Three actions to recover compensation for personal injuries were brought against the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company at the Liverpool Assizes on Saturday. A verdict for the plaintiff was given in each case, the compensation allowed being respectively £50, £220, and £2000. The latter sum was awarded to Mr. W. H. Goodair, cotton spinner and manufacturer, of Preston and Manchester, who was injured in a collision which occurred at German's Bridge, near Preston, on April 17 last. Francis Carr, a Liverpool customs boatman, recovered £600 from a shipowner upon whose vessel he had received serious injuries to his head through the negligence of the defendant's servants. Mr. C. C. Ward, who had been engaged in assisting his father in teaching, obtained a verdict for £750 against the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, on Tuesday, as compensation for serious injuries sustained by him in the collision that occurred at German's Bridge, Preston. Mrs. Phillips, a widow lady, got a verdict against the same company for £1600, for injuries received in a collision that took place near Pendleton in December, 1872. £1300 damages is the latest award given against the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company this Assizes. Mr. James Dera, an auctioneer, of Manchester, had been badly injured in a collision at Pendleton last December.

The December Sessions of the Central Criminal Court were opened on Monday, with forty-two prisoners for trial. In a case in which a boy pleaded guilty to having feloniously set fire to a stack of hay, the Recorder took occasion to condemn the practice of giving a gratuity to the person who brought to the brigade the first information of a fire. The trial of William Parker for the murder of his two children at Wapping was postponed to the January Sessions. John Chas. Aselin, a clerk, who had been committed on a charge of forgery upon Messrs. Roberts and Lubbock, was acquitted, no evidence having been offered against him. On Tuesday Benoni Leblanc pleaded guilty to having forged the brand and trade-mark of Messrs. Moët and Chandon, the well-known champagne manufacturers, and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Mr. John Hampden, whose wager with Mr. Alfred Russell Wallace respecting the rotundity of the earth will be well remembered, was brought up for not having fulfilled the pledge which he had given—that of keeping the peace towards that gentleman. He was therefore sentenced to two months' imprisonment. At Wednesday's sitting William Grenett Davis, twenty-three, late an articled clerk to a firm of City solicitors, pleaded guilty to having embezzled about £2500, and was sentenced to eight years' penal servitude. He had stolen and squandered this sum in a single year. Two labourers named Mason and Lahore were convicted of manslaughter, and each of them was sentenced to five years' penal servitude. Joseph Minto, described as a merchant, who had pleaded guilty to a charge of unlawfully obtaining goods within four months of his bankruptcy, was ordered to be imprisoned for nine months, without hard labour.

Jean Luie, alias Lundgren, who gave evidence of an extraordinary character in the Tichborne case, was charged at Bow-street, on Saturday, with having committed wilful and corrupt perjury, and also with having neglected—he being a convict at large on license—to report himself as required by the law. The prisoner was remanded. On Tuesday Jean Luie was again brought up at Bow-street. The revocation of his ticket of leave was read over, and he was committed to the convict prison at Pentonville to undergo the remainder of his term of penal servitude. Instructions would in the mean time, it was said, be laid before counsel respecting the charge of perjury against the prisoner in connection with the Tichborne case. When asked by Sir Thomas Henry if he had any statement to make, Luie replied that he was sorry for what had happened. It would not have happened if he had not been encouraged and made up to do what he had done.

At the Middlesex Sessions George Lacey has been sentenced to eight months' hard labour for a cruel fraud. Having been recently in prison, he found that a man named Ford was undergoing a longer sentence, and, on being discharged, he went to this man's wife and induced her to believe that by sending him through him to the Governor she could obtain her husband's release. A romantic story was told at this session of a prisoner who had leaped from a train in rapid motion and escaped from the custody of a policeman two years ago. Both men had displayed considerable daring, and the Bench rewarded the officer and decided not to inflict further punishment upon the prisoner.

Mr. Samuel Bennett, of New-cross, was fined forty shillings, at the Mansion House, on Tuesday, for travelling on the South-Eastern Railway in a superior carriage to that for which he had paid the fare.

A salesman lately in the employment of the fruit merchants, Messrs. Draper and Son, Covent-garden, was on Wednesday committed, at Bow-street, on a charge of fraud. A dealer, named Isaacs, had induced him to falsify entries of sales made to Isaacs, who subsequently allowed him about a fifth share of the plunder. The chief accomplice has absconded.

At Marlborough-street, on Wednesday, a man was convicted of having attempted to obtain a situation as footman by means of a false character, and was fined £20, with the alternative of three months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

A grocer was on Tuesday fined twenty shillings and costs, at Clerkenwell, for selling coffee mixed with chicory.

Eleven persons were summoned at Southwark, on Tuesday, by the London School Board, for neglecting and refusing to send their children to schools provided for them in the district, and fined in small sums.

Constable Kinsey has effected a clever capture of burglars at a warehouse in Noble-street. He found three men at the door of the warehouse, and seized one; shortly afterwards a second was captured in a public-house. When the premises were examined, thirty-two rolls of silk, value £1600, were discovered packed up for removal. The owner had been previously robbed to the extent of £1000.

At Guildhall, on Tuesday, a licensed victualler of Cambridge was convicted of having sent six quarters of unwholesome mutton to the London market for sale as human food. He was fined £20 and three guineas costs. At the same court a costermonger named Oliff was fined 20s. and costs, or fourteen days' imprisonment, for exposing for sale 400 putrid coconuts.

Milk-sellers are being diligently looked after in Marylebone, and one of them, who had skimmed his milk besides watering it, had to pay a special penalty of £5, with £2 9s. costs. The Clerkenwell authorities have begun prosecuting, and the first offenders summoned were fined 20s. each.—A large number of "milk" dealers were fined at one of the Dublin police courts, last Saturday, for their efforts to promote water-drinking. There were cases in which the adulteration was stated at 50, 66, 80, and 90 per cent; but one dealer, Anne Wilson, of 91, Lower Mecklenburgh-street, carried off the palm, the adulteration in her case being 100 per cent.

John Edward Foley, with the alias of John Edwards, was convicted at Marylebone, on Monday, on two several charges of neglecting to pay cabmen their fares, and was ordered by Mr. D'Eyncourt to pay 31s. 8d., the amount of the first claim, or, in default, to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for one month, and on the second charge to pay £2 9s. 6d., or suffer, in default, five weeks' imprisonment. An incident of the case was the mistaken arrest of a gentleman named Herring, who generously said that, finding the cabman who had given him in custody bore an excellent character, he should waive his action for false imprisonment.

Property worth between £200 and £300 having been taken from the house of Mr. Arthur Thomson, of Notting-hill, by his cook, Eliza Clayton, and pledged with Mr. Smith, a pawnbroker, of Devonshire-terrace, the woman was brought before Mr. Ingham, at Hammersmith Police Court. In committing her for trial the magistrate observed that the Judge would decide what should be done with the pawnbroker.

For running down a volunteer corps, by furiously driving, James Darch, a carman, was, on Monday, committed for trial from Worship-street. Damage to the property of the corps will be the subject of a civil action.

James Sinclair, second mate of the steam-ship Osborne, which ran down a fishing-boat off Great Yarmouth in October last, was tried at Edinburgh, on Monday, on a charge of the culpable homicide of ten persons. He was acquitted by a unanimous verdict.

At Winchester Assizes, yesterday week, the grand jury ignored the bill against Captain Fox, of the 100th Regiment, and six men, who were committed by the Portsmouth coroner and magistrates, on the charge of manslaughter, they having assisted at a boxing-match in which a man named James Lynch received injuries from which he died.

The punishment of the lash was inflicted, yesterday week, on a couple of ruffians in Newgate, for robbery and violence. Both men assumed a defiant hardihood, and took their punishment without uttering a single cry or groan.

Under an impression that he had been wronged, a carpenter, named James Redgrave Harris, shot at and injured Mr. William Walter, a solicitor, of Newgate-street. The offender has been committed for trial.—At Liverpool, on Tuesday, Thomas Corrigan was found guilty of the murder of his mother at Liverpool on Nov. 1, under very atrocious circumstances. He was sentenced to death.—Two men were convicted of robbery by garrotting at Liverpool, on Tuesday, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude and twenty lashes each.—At the close of the inquiry into the Rhyl murder Margaret Thomas was committed for trial as principal and Ann Yates as accessory. Evan Parry was discharged.—Edward Gough, miner, was sentenced to death at Durham, on Saturday, for the murder of James Partington by stabbing. The jury recommended the prisoner to mercy.—William Thompson, a miner, was, on Monday, found guilty at Durham of the wilful murder of his wife, and was sentenced to death.—A sailor who made a ferocious attack on one of the warders in Lewes Gaol, on Tuesday, attempted his own life on Wednesday by hanging himself in his cell. He was cut down while yet living, but just on the point of suffocation.—On Monday afternoon a farm labourer named Vincent, living in the parish of Cotton, went to the house of Mr. Murton, a farmer in the same parish, where his daughter, aged twenty, was employed as a domestic servant, and asked that she should be allowed a few days' holiday at Christmas. Her master refused to allow the girl to be away at night, and shortly afterwards the father returned, went into the back kitchen, cut his daughter's throat, and went away. On Tuesday morning his body was found with a deep gash in the throat in a pond about two hundred yards from M. Murton's house. The girl is expected to recover.

Lord Truro presided, yesterday week, at the annual distribution of prizes to the 3rd Middlesex Artillery Volunteers in Westminster Hall. Previous to the ceremony his Lordship addressed the members of the corps. Next day Lady Cranston distributed the prizes to the 40th Middlesex Rifle Volunteers at Gray's-Inn Hall. In the evening the Lord Mayor distributed prizes to the Southwark Volunteers (7th Surrey) at the Cannon-street Hotel. The annual distribution of prizes to the Lambeth Volunteers (19th Surrey) was held at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington, on the same evening. Colonel Lane Fox, commanding the 48th Depot Brigade, presiding. The members of the London Scottish corps have resolved to establish a school of arms, in which fencing, the broadsword, the bayonet exercise, and military extension motions will be taught.—On Wednesday the Earl of Derby, who is honorary Colonel of the 1st Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, delivered the prizes to the regiment at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, in the presence of a crowded audience.

ILLUSTRATED NEW BOOKS.

The most important original work of art-illustration published this season is The Gospel According to St. John, with Bida's masterly etchings, which are designed with a high degree of imaginative power and representative truth. They consist, with the frontispiece, which shows the Evangelist writing, of twenty-six scenes in the life and ministry of our Saviour, conceived in a spirit of reverent sincerity, and devotion to the main purport of the sacred history, which has a very impressive effect. The style is more like that of Dutch or Flemish art than Italian, but with a noble grace in the principal figures, and a breadth in the landscapes, which suit the moral dignity of this exalted theme. Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Searle are the publishers of the four volumes which will comprise this and the three other Gospel narratives.

The pencil of Mr. Elijah Walton has on former occasions been employed with eminent success in depicting the grandest scenery of Alpine Switzerland and Piedmont, the coast of Norway, and the hallowed or classic sites of Greece, Syria, and Egypt, as well as the flowers of the high mountain region. These water-colour drawings have been reproduced by chromolithography, and published by Mr. W. M. Thompson, of Cockspur-street and the Burlington Gallery. A new volume is now issued, The Bernese Oberland: Twelve Scenes Among its Peaks and Lakes. The chromolithographs of this series are rather larger than those of "The Coast of Norway," and nearly twice the size of "Vignettes, Alpine and Eastern." Their subjects are, the Gletscherhorn, from above Interlachen; the town and castle of Thun; the Viescherhorn and the Unter-Grindelwald Glacier; the Jungfrau, from near Interlachen; a sunrise on the Lake of Lucerne; the Schreckhorn, from near Grindelwald; the Staubbach, from Lanterbrunnen; the Mönch, from above the Lake of Thun; the Lake of Lucerne, with Mont Pilatus by moonlight; the Dolderhorn, from near the Lake of Thun; the Wetterhorn, at evening; and the Eiger, from the north-east. The views were taken by Mr. Walton in 1872. Descriptive notices of these glorious places are furnished by the Rev. T. G. Bonney, of St. John's College, Cambridge. The lover of Nature's beauties and sublimities will enjoy this feast of the admiring eye and mind brought home to us from the Alps of Bern.

We find great interest in the series of twenty Etchings on the Most, by Mr. Ernest George, the architect (Murray, publisher). They are works of genuine taste and high artistic merit, such as appear fully to justify the opinion of Mr. Ruskin, who advised Mr. George to practise this department of art. He had, on a former occasion, produced some pen-and-ink sketches of German towns, repeated by the anastatic process, but he was not quite satisfied with the result. Under the practical instruction of Mr. Oldham Barlow, he therefore applied himself to etching, and with a result which is really deserving of praise. The subjects are taken from Metz, Thionville, Treves, Berncastel, and several other places on the Moselle, ending with the ruins of the Elector's Palace at Coblenz. These scenes are among the most picturesque to be found in that part of Europe.

A series of ideal figures of the chief female characters in the Bible narratives, entitled Woman in Sacred History, forms one of the Christmas books newly published (by Sampson Low, Marston, and Searle). It contains fifteen representations, which are chromolithographs, drawn by Jehenne, and printed at Paris, of pictures mostly by modern French artists, Horace Vernet, Landelle, Vernet-Lecomte, Merle, and Boulanger, along with two or three by Koehler of Germany, Portaels of Belgium, and the Italian Batoni, as well as Raphael's Sistine Madonna. Side by side with the last-named personification, which is treated as mythical, the editor has placed one of "Mary, the Mother of Jesus," with a commentary in the tone more congenial to Protestant than to Roman Catholic minds. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe is the writer of these biographical scripture notices, which are thoughtful, carefully studied, and generally expressive of a right feeling. The subjects of the pictures are Sarah, Hagar, Rebekah, Leah, and Rachel, belonging to the Patriarchal Age; Miriam, Deborah, Delilah, Jephthah's daughter, Hannah, Ruth, the Witch of Endor, Esther, and Judith, of the Jewish National History; and of the Christian History, Mary the Virgin Mother, under two forms or imagined aspects; the Daughter of Herodias, the Woman of Samaria, Mary Magdalene, and the sisters Martha and Mary. They are of unequal merit, but some are very good, and are well reproduced in this volume.

From the renowned artistic workshop of that eminent colour-printer and illuminator, Marcus Ward, of Chandos-street and Belfast, proceed several new publications which deserve our praise. We should first commend his Practical Treatise on the Art of Illuminating, a brief account of its processes, rules, and materials, with many beautiful examples, some in chromolithography, which are facsimiles of the ancient originals, and some drawings in outline. They show the styles of illuminating manuscripts, and latterly printed books, at different periods from the sixth century to the present time. The educated eye, with or without any intention of learning to practise this exquisite art, may derive a great deal of refined pleasure from Mr. Ward's book upon the subject. In the other publications bearing his name on their titlepage provision is made for the gratification of young readers. He has for this purpose secured the literary co-operation of a clever lady, Mrs. George Cupples. Her Kitty Lester, a Book for Girls, is a pleasant and sensible story of life in an English rural home, surrounded by the familiar objects of the country, sheep and cattle, horses and dogs, birds and bees and butterflies, trees, grass, corn, and wild flowers, not to speak of the red deer of Exmoor. The chromolithographs and other pictures are designed by Mr. Harrison Weir. In The Children's Voyage; or, a Trip with the Water Fairy, Mrs. Cupples has not, as one might fancy from the title, carried her little friends away into the realms of the supernatural, but has taken them for a safe and pleasant voyage in their papa's sailing-yacht from the Thames to the port of Edinburgh. The artist who has in this instance made drawings for the chromolithographer is Mr. Edward Duncan, an esteemed member of the Society of Painters in Water Colours. Another nice juvenile gift-book is The Little Flower-Seeders, by Rosa Mulholland, with a dozen coloured pictures of flowers. There may, perhaps, be some difference of opinion concerning Picture Stories from the Japanese. The drawings, in the Far Eastern style, and, we are told, "by native talent," are extremely grotesque. The colouring is brilliant as the eye can endure. But it is worth while to consider what may be the unsuspected influence, upon a child's aesthetic sensibility, of dwelling on these splendid monstrosities. If the child is hereafter to obtain a true and refined perception of beauty, and especially of harmony, its education ought not to be commenced with such pictures as we find here. Yet they are clever and very laughable. They are scenes of the old Arabian tales—of Aladdin, Abon Hassan, Ali Baba, and Sindbad, each of which is related in sprightly verse, but rather too lengthy for children. Mr. Marcus Ward is also the publisher of The Garland of the Year—a very elegant little volume, containing twelve chromolithographs of flowers, one for each month, upon a ground of gold, with a verse of suitable poetry, inscribed in illuminated text, on the same ground. The designs are by Mr. F. Edward Hulme. With each month's floral emblem the editor has connected a brief notice of the month's natural and social history, and a few passages selected from the best English poets. This will do for a gift to a grown-up young lady; but among the best of Mr. Ward's publications for children we are especially pleased with Tem, the Story of a Very Little Boy. Its author, Mr. H. Rutherford Russell, has entered with the insight of true sympathy into the mind of a child, and has produced a lively image of its condition. This little book is almost as good, in its way, as Mr. Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland," though it has less of humorous fancy. Parents and lovers of childhood will like it as much as the childish reader is sure to do.

French child-stories, as on some former occasions, have now again been adapted to the demands of English nursery literature, and gracefully illustrated by the designs of Mr. Lorenz Frölich. They are, in this instance, those of a brother and sister, who appear here under the names of Davie and Dot; and a series of moral examples, or anecdotes, entitled Good Little Children, from the French of P. J. Stahl. The publishers are Messrs. Seeley and Co., who have also produced The Life of a Bear, a very amusing narrative, with an abundance of clever woodcuts.

MAKING THE CHRISTMAS PLUM-PUDDING IN CHINA.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The spirit of the present age takes a large number of our young men to India, China, Australia, the backwoods of America, and various other places all over the earth, where they will find that most of their requirements will be of little or no use to them. While the standard of literary education is being raised, the knowledge of common things should not be forgotten. The old story of the philosopher and the ferryman teaches a good lesson on this head. A philosopher, crossing the river, was talking with the ferryman, and he chanced to ask if he had ever studied philosophy, and the ferryman answered, "No." "Ah," said the philosopher, "then one half of your life has been lost to you." He then asked the ferryman if he had ever studied logic; and the reply was again "No." "Then the other half of your life has been a blank." He was about to make another inquiry, when he was interrupted by the ferryman asking if he could swim; and on the philosopher saying "No," he was told that he would lose his whole life at once, for the boat was sinking, and nothing could save him.

To tie a knot on a rope, so that it will hold; to be able to sew on a button; to dress a wound properly; to make a good basin of gruel for one who is ill; or to be able to do a little cooking, are all accomplishments of the highest value, almost anywhere, but still more so when fate sends one to distant lands. There are numberless little acquirements, that might be easily learned, and by means of which one would become useful, not only to himself, but to others, and this is one of the duties inculcated by all teaching. "I Follow Fame" was the motto which the young knight had put on his shield, when Merlin, taking the brush, blotted it out and inscribed "Rather Use than Fame." Tennyson indicates his own ideas of the teaching of these words, by saying—

You should have seen him blush; but afterwards
He made a stalwart knight.

This we should take as implying that one may be useful, and earn fame into the bargain.

It was my fate to spend Christmas last year in China, and the house I chanced to be living in contained a number of young gentlemen belonging to one of the large mercantile firms. In their arrangements for the Christmas dinner, it was found that none of the Chinese servants knew how to make a plum-pudding. Here was a difficulty. What useless fellows we all found ourselves, when the question went round if anyone could make a plum-pudding! The fancy accomplishments which each was known to possess became the subject of contemptuous and sarcastic sneers. Any man who would undertake to make a plum-pudding had an opening before him of becoming a hero. Whoever could achieve this triumph would be the man whose education was up to the "spirit of the times." According to Mr. Carlyle's view of destiny, the opportunity and the hero come together. The next evening some friends came in, and the probable famine in the matter of plum-pudding became naturally a subject of conversation, when one of the gentlemen present offered his services. Had a superior being from a brighter sphere come down to assist us, the joy could not have been greater. His coat was pulled off, and there was a rush to the kitchen, where, the materials being all ready, the process was gone through, with an earnest and inquiring crowd of pig-tails around the table. The Chinese "boys" knew of the difficulty, and, from the way they watched the whole proceeding, I have no doubt that, with the Chinaman's powers of imitation, a perfect facsimile, even to the exact number of plums, will be produced by them on Christmas Day this year. If they do so it will be a good one; for the pudding we got was no makeshift; it was as good an article of the kind as ever appeared on the table. The behaviour of our useful hero was in keeping with Tennyson's description. He was a stalwart knight in more senses than one. His big beard made a fine contrast to the hairless chins of the Turanian spectators who watched his every movement. And he also illustrates the principle that these useful accomplishments do not interfere with higher walks of study, for our friend is the principal scene-painter of the amateur corps of the place, and is a very clever artist.

Mr. Howard Staunton has, "on account of his pre-eminent services as an editor of Shakespeare's works," been elected an honorary member of the German Shakespeare Society, a very distinguished body of scholars.

The Board of Trade inquiry into the circumstances of the burning and subsequent sinking of the Nagpore in Kingstown harbour on Nov. 9 has ended, the Court exonerating the master from all blame.

The Postmaster-General lately had his attention called to the arrangements regulating the inland book-post service, and a request was made that the standard of 18 inches, which was fixed two years ago, might be increased to 2 feet, at which it previously stood. The reply of the Post Office is to the effect that it is not expedient to make any alteration.

Mr. Henry Thompson, of Mincing-lane, and other members of his family, have undertaken to bear the cost of the erection of one of the houses of the eighth block of the Royal National Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, situated at Ventnor, at a cost of about £1700. The committee only await the receipt of funds for the adjoining house to complete the entire design of the hospital, which will provide accommodation for over one hundred patients. The chapel for the use of the patients was opened by the Bishop of Winchester on Saturday last. It has been raised by special contributions, Mrs. F. Hamilton being the chief contributor.

ANCRUM HOUSE, NEAR JEDBURGH, LATELY DESTROYED BY FIRE.

MAKING A CHRISTMAS PUDDING IN CHINA.

SIR W. V. HARCOURT, M.P., THE NEW SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

MR. A. R. WALKER, MAYOR OF LIVERPOOL.

SIR SAMUEL BAKER AT THE MEETING OF THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

ANCRUM HOUSE, JEDBURGH.

It has been related how this mansion, the old ancestral residence of Sir William Scott, Bart., was entirely destroyed by fire on the night of Tuesday, the 2nd inst. The fire seems to have originated in a dressing-room on the fourth floor of the central tower, about seven o'clock in the evening. It is likely to have been caused by the exposure to fire in the grate of some old beam in the chimney. The rapidity with which the fire spread through the rooms, with the absence of any fire-engine (the nearest being at Ke'so, twelve miles distant), while the fury of the flames increased every moment, too soon proved to Sir William, though hundreds of willing hands, at the sound of the alarm-bell, had flocked from the neighbouring villages to his assistance, that their endeavours were useless, and that the noble old building was doomed. Their efforts were then directed to saving the valuable furniture, pictures, and plate in the lower stories, and much of this property was successfully preserved; but many old family relics, beautiful old carvings, and furniture, and some valuable papers, with nearly the whole of Lady Scott's jewels, were destroyed. The fire continued to burn through all that night and most of the next day; and now but crumbling walls and a heap of ashes mark where Ancrum House so long had stood.

The house, an illustration of which we have engraved, showing the east front, stood in the midst of a park, celebrated throughout Scotland for the magnificent size of its trees and for the varied beauties of hill, rocks, fern, crags, and river scenery. This mansion was one of great antiquity. We read in "The History of the Border" how the castle of Ancrum was destroyed by fire in 1513, after the battle of Flodden; but with the stone and other materials of that ancient castle the central tower, shown in our illustration, was built in the year 1542. Various additions have been made since then, by the predecessors of Sir William, who represents one of the oldest families in Scotland, their deeds and charters dating back as far as 1128. It was the late Sir William Scott, father of the present Baronet, who added a large west tower and wing, in most perfect keeping with the rest of the old house, and who, by his care and love of the place, did much to beautify it and to render it what it was, part of the pride and beauty of the Border. Its associations and historic memories in past ages, and the kind hospitality for which, during the last fifty years, it has been widely noted, will make its loss to be deeply felt by many others besides Sir William and his family.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

The Queen on Friday week, at Windsor, received the newly-appointed Solicitor-General and Vice-Chancellor, with two colonial Chief Justices, and conferred upon each of those four gentlemen the honour of knighthood. Sir William George Vernon Harcourt, Q.C., who has succeeded Mr. Henry James in the office of Solicitor-General, is second son of the late Rev. William Vernon Harcourt, and grandson of the late Most Rev. Dr. Edward Vernon Harcourt, many years Archbishop of York. He was born on Oct. 14, 1827, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1851, and obtained the honours of a senior optime and a first-class man in the classical tripos. He was called to the Bar, at the Middle Temple, in Easter Term, 1854, when he chose the Home Circuit; in 1856 he was made a Queen's Counsel. He has been a Commissioner for the Amendment of the Naturalisation Laws, and also of the Neutrality Laws. He has held the professorship of international law in the University of Cambridge. He has sat as the colleague of Mr. Cardwell in the representation of the city of Oxford since the last general election. He is married to a daughter of the late Mr. Thomas H. Lister, and stepdaughter of Sir George C. Lewis.

The Portrait of Sir William Vernon Harcourt is from a photograph by Mr. H. J. Whitlock, of Birmingham.

THE MAYOR OF LIVERPOOL.

The munificent act of liberality with which Mr. A. B. Walker has commenced his year of office as Mayor of Liverpool was the subject of notice a few weeks ago. His offer to provide at his own cost for the erection of a Gallery of Fine Arts, the probable outlay upon which is estimated at £20,000, is worthy of the position he holds in that great commercial town, and it will be cherished in the memory of future generations, along with the instance of a similar princely gift, by Mr. William Brown, in the endowment of the Free Library there. We have much pleasure in setting before our readers the portrait of Mr. Walker, from a photograph by Messrs. Vandyke and Brown, of Lord-street, Liverpool.

SIR SAMUEL BAKER'S LECTURE.

The lecture which Sir Samuel Baker delivered to the Royal Geographical Society on Monday week, and which was honoured with the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, has been read by most of those who would have desired to hear it from his own lips. The audience numbered about 1500 ladies and gentlemen, in the lecture-theatre of the new buildings of London University, in Burlington-gardens. The benches were crowded, and there was a crush to get in at the doors. The chair was occupied by Sir Bartle Frere, president of the society, but Sir Henry Rawlinson, the late president, was there also. Sir Samuel Baker commenced by giving an account of the mission he undertook, from the Khedive or Viceroy of Egypt, to go up the Nile with a military force and put a stop to the practices of kidnapping and slave-trading. He observed that he had the honour to accompany the Prince and Princess of Wales in Egypt, and it was by the advice of the Prince of Wales that he accepted the offer which the Khedive made him, after a conversation between the Khedive and the Prince upon the subject. This remark induced his Royal Highness, later in the evening, when Sir Samuel Baker had finished his interesting narrative, to rise and say a few words. The Prince expressed the pleasure he felt in welcoming Sir Samuel upon his safe return to England, and in witnessing the successful accomplishment of his great enterprise. He was quite sure that the enlightened ruler of Egypt was sincere in his wish to suppress the slave trade in Central Africa; but there were great difficulties in such a matter, dealing with people thousands of miles distant. As for Sir Samuel Baker, he had not only maintained his high character as a traveller, a sportsman, and a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, but as a philanthropist he had performed a great work for the benefit of human kind. This well-merited eulogy was received with hearty cheers. Sir Bartle Frere then offered his own congratulations and those of the society to Sir Samuel and Lady Baker, alluding to the high courage and true womanly affection she had displayed as the companion of her husband through all his perilous and laborious adventures. Sir Samuel briefly acknowledged the vote of thanks, and the company gave three hearty cheers for his wife as well as for himself.

On Monday last Sir Samuel Baker lectured at the United Service Institution on "Savage Warfare." The chair was filled by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-Chief; and many officers of high rank and distinction were among the audience.

The above collection of Carols has been gathered from various sources. Sometimes from the lips of the rustic singer, sometimes from old MSS., and sometimes from printed books. They have been carefully harmonised and arranged, some as solos, and others for four voices, and may all be played on the Pianoforte alone, or sung by a single voice accompanied by the instrument. The present collection (unlike others) consists of the old traditional Carol tunes, with the original words.

THE ALEXANDER NEW SEVEN-GUINEA ORGAN HARMONIUM. Solid Oak Case, Five Octaves, and Two Foot-Boards. The ever-increasing musical culture in all classes of society has created a demand for free reed instruments of a superior quality to those hitherto manufactured. The instruments now offered to the public will be found devoid of all that has hitherto been considered objectionable as regards tone. This end has been obtained by using a larger and thicker tongue, and a new system of voicing, which renders the quality rich and organ-like. Another advantage in the new system is the increased strength of the reeds, and diminished liability to go out of tune by swelling the bellows. The new system is applied to all the large instruments with still greater effect and without extra cost.

CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

RECOMMENDED BY ALL THE PROFESSORS. THE DIGITORIUM (a small Dumb Piano-Forte). This remarkable invention materially assists any person to play and become perfect on the Pianoforte, Organ, or Harmonium, by strengthening and rendering the fingers independent in an amazingly short time; and can now be had for 15s.; or, with ivory keys, 18s. of the sole Manufacturer, CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

MR. CHARLES REED, M.P., THE NEW CHAIRMAN OF THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

BOMBARDMENT OF CARTHAGENA: VIEW FROM MOUNT FORMAN, LOOKING WEST.

MR. CHARLES REED, M.P.

The election of this gentleman to succeed Lord Lawrence as chairman of the new London School Board is a fit occasion for our Journal to contain his portrait. He was vice-chairman of the late board, having been chosen one of its members, for the Hackney division, in November, 1870. Mr. Reed has sat in the House of Commons for the borough of Hackney since the general Parliamentary election of November, 1868, when that borough first exercised its new privilege of representation; but he has been nearly thirty years an active member of the Corporation of the city of London. He is one of four sons of that eminent philanthropist and minister of religion, the late Rev. Dr. Andrew Reed, of Hackney, who was founder of the London Orphan Asylum, formerly at Clapton, now at Watford; the Infant Orphan Asylum at Wanstead; the Earlwood Asylum for Idiots, Redhill; the Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reedham, near Croydon; and the Royal Hospital for Incurables at Putney. Mr. Charles Reed was born July 20, 1819. He was educated at London University, and got his first training in business at a woollen factory in Leeds, where he resided five years. He is now senior partner in the firm of Messrs. Reed and Fox, type-founders, of Fann-street, Aldersgate. In 1846 he married Miss Margaret Baines, youngest daughter of the late Mr. Edward Baines, M.P. for Leeds and proprietor of the Leeds Mercury, sister of the present Mr. Edward Baines, M.P., who now conducts that journal, and of the late Right Hon. Matthew Talbot Baines, M.P. Mr. Reed has several sons and daughters. He is a deputy for the ward of Farringdon Within in the Common Council, and has done good service to the City in many useful matters. As representative of the Corporation for the management of its Ulster estates and deputy-governor of the Irish Society, as a conservator of the river Thames, as chairman of the committee for the recovery of Bunhill-fields burial-ground and its preservation to the public use, as chairman of the Library committee, and a manager of the City of London School, he has earned the signal thanks of his fellow-citizens; but he has not yet worn the aldermanic gown or sought the higher municipal offices. He is a deputy-lieutenant and a magistrate for Middlesex and Westminster. Inheriting the principles of a Nonconformist in religious and ecclesiastical politics, he is president of the Protestant Dissenting lay deputies of the Independent, Presbyterian, and Baptist congregations. He is also, or has been, chairman of the London Missionary Society and one of the committee of the Bible Society. Two of his brothers—the Rev. Andrew Reed, of St. Leonards, and the Rev. Dr. Martin Reed, of Hastings—are Dissenting ministers. Mr. Charles Reed was an intimate friend of the late Mr. Peabody, and is left one of the executors of that benevolent American's will in England. He has devoted some attention to literary pursuits and antiquarian studies. The biography of his father, published ten years ago, is a book of much interest and value. He has moreover written a history of the Plantation of Ulster in the reign of James I., and of the administration of the Irish Society. As a Liberal politician, Mr. Reed's views and conduct are well known. He is in favour of the equalisation of poor rates throughout the metropolitan parishes; and he is opposed to a purely secular scheme of education.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Rockwood, of New York.

THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN.

The naval seaport town of Carthagena, on the Mediterranean coast of Spain, is still held by the faction of Intransigentes, or fanatical Communists, against the Government of Madrid, whose military forces, under General Ceballos, now superseded by Dominguez, has attacked the town rather feebly on the land side. The bombardment, indeed, though ineffective for the reduction of a fortified place, has caused a terrible amount of distress to the people of the town. The state of things within Carthagena has been very fully described by the Times correspondent, who stayed there, with three or four other Englishmen, till the 27th ult., when they and the English Consul were requested by Admiral Sir Hastings Yelverton to come on board the flagship of our squadron at Escombrera Bay. Five hundred women and children were next day, between midnight and four in the morning, removed by the boats of an Italian frigate, belonging to the squadron under Admiral Bronchetti, who had obtained a suspension of hostilities for this purpose. The fighting extended outside the town to Escombrera, on the 13th inst., so that the English and other foreigners there would be recommended to leave that place. The forts and batteries of Carthagena were still returning the besiegers' fire on Tuesday last.

We are indebted to Dr. Fleetwood Buckle, senior surgeon of H.M.S. Invincible, for a sketch taken by him on the 28th from the top of Mount Porman, a height of 1000 ft., looking westward, which gives a view of the valley behind Carthagena, with the forts and batteries, and the lines of besiegers and besieged. To the right hand, down in the hollow beneath the spectator, is a small lagoon called the Mar Mener, azure blue, and dotted with islets. In the middle, directly before the eyes of one looking down from Mount Porman, is a richly-cultivated, fertile plain, interspersed with villages, gardens, orange groves, country houses, and factories. Here and there is a low hillock, behind which the besiegers are protected during the construction of their earthworks. Halfway across the plain is the busy little manufacturing town of Las Alumbas; to the right, at the foot of the hill, are the English iron and lead works of Las Herreras. The head-quarters of General Ceballos were at La Palma, below the middle hill facing the spectator; but they have been removed to Las Alumbas, in order to stop the carriage of supplies by the Escombrera road. In the left centre is Moros Castle, firing rapidly, but with little effect. The hill which rises above this to the left is the highest on the east side of Carthagena, overlooking the town and harbour beyond, which are out of sight of the spectator on Mount Porman. Fort St. Julian, the key to the whole position, is conspicuous on the summit of that hill. Beyond it, a long way off, at the other side of the harbour, is Fort Galeras, or what has been called Postman's Hill. The chapel and whitewashed houses of the cemetery are seen halfway down the hill to the left hand. It was on the third day of the bombardment that Admiral Yelverton allowed a large party of officers of the squadron to go ashore in the yacht Helicon, and to ascend Mount Porman, for a view of the neighbourhood of Carthagena, as it appears during the siege. The Spanish Government squadron does not at present join with the land forces in the attack.

A life-boat contributed to the National Life-Boat Institution, through its Manchester branch, by Mr. Job Hindley, as the gift of a working man of Manchester, was publicly exhibited in that city on Friday, the 19th inst., prior to being forwarded to its station at Seaton Carew, Durham. It was built by Messrs. Forrest, of Limehouse, and is named the Job Hindley, after the donor. The National Life-Boat Institution has now 235 life-boats under its management, fifteen of which have been contributed by the Manchester branch. Each life-boat establishment requires an expenditure of about £70 a year to maintain it in a state of efficiency.

FINE ARTS.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

The present winter exhibition of so-called sketches and studies shows, we think, a progressive improvement in the average of merit, but there is little distinction as regards the degree of finish expended on a majority of the works between this and the spring exhibition of completed drawings.

A number of studies and drawings by Messrs. M'Kewan and Shalders testify by their excellence to the great loss the society has sustained by the death of those members. We have often borne witness to the rare ability displayed by Mr. M'Kewan in his paintings of interiors; and all, and more than all, we have said applies to the fine colouring, the masterly, decisive handling, and the admirable general effect of his numerous studies here from Hardwick, Knole, Cothelie, and other picturesque old English interiors. The Surrey landscapes, generally with sheep very agreeably introduced, by Mr. Shalders, also possess a genuine charm of natural variety and freshness, and sometimes uncommon truth of sunlight and atmospheric effect. One of the most important examples here is "Early Spring" (206).

Other members of long-standing, and, happily, still living, are well represented. Mr. Louis Haghe, the new president, is particularly fortunate in some drawings on a rather smaller scale than usual (or studies for larger works), with figures in seventeenth-century costumes, set in the old Flemish interiors he loves so well. The composition appears more concentrated, and the colouring is certainly richer within the reduced dimensions of these works. Then there are two larger drawings (Nos. 205 and 255), which, with a variety of appropriate episode, tell the story of a night sortie of troops from a besieged town, and the return of the same band at early morning with many wounded. Mr. Leitch's taste in arrangement, and in the conduct of effect—a rare quality in English landscape-painting of the present day—is displayed in "The Warlock Knowe—Scene on the River Ayr" (93). Mr. Harry Johnson likewise manifests a nice feeling for the amenities of landscape in several Italian subjects, of which the most elaborate is "The Roman Campagna" (289). Mr. J. C. Reed has made a distinct advance in refinement, see "Arundel Castle" (25) and "Streteley and Goring" (266). Mr. J. W. Whymper's "Weald of Surrey" (259); the marine piece, "A Brig Drifting" (229), by Mr. E. Hayes; coast scenes by Mr. Mogford and Mr. Philip; the clever yet careful and truthful "Mediterranean Shore near Cette—Removing Wreck" (83), by Mr. R. Beavis; "The Drover" (90), by Mr. Hargitt; views in Venice and France (sound and honest, but a little heavy in the too-positive shadows), by Mr. W. Wyld; many "bits" from Switzerland, by Mr. W. L. Thomas; and several sketches by Mr. Telbin are likewise entitled to commendation. Mr. C. Werner has broken new ground in Spain in a study of "The Interior of the Vestry of Toledo Cathedral" (47); but the hard, and we must say mechanical, finish which has characterised his Eastern subjects, especially of late, is not less apparent. Mr. Absolon contributes, in addition to pretty conventionalities in his customary vein, several comic sketches; but the method of this painter, like that of Mr. Rowbotham, reminds one, in its smartness and cleanness, of chromolithography rather than of nature. Mr. Cattermole's dexterous and picturesque costumed figures and groups would be more acceptable if they were less mannered in treatment, or even if their mannerism were more original.

Turning to works more serious or sincere in intention, we welcome a small drawing, by M. Israels, of a solitary fisherman looking pensively at evening through the window of her cottage towards the seashore and a row of beached boats. It is a mere trifle, yet it strikes a true chord of imaginative sadness. The Dutch master has found a worthy disciple in the young English painter Mr. Hugh Carter; witness his capably characteristic figure of an old Schevening fishwife (262) and his "Young Shrimpers" (50). The broad and transparent mode of painting in water colours is likewise practised by Messrs. Collier and Orrock; but these artists have evidently adopted David Cox as their model. "The Downs near Lewes—Hazy Morning" (62) and "Rannock Moor, Argyleshire" (250), by the former, have a breadth of execution, and luminous, silvery effect, which would be not unworthy of the deceased English master himself. Mr. Orrock, too, is realising more of the spirit, with the manner, of Cox; see particularly the "Study of Rough Sea" (54). Those of Mr. Hine's studies here which appear to have received the least studio elaboration strike us as the most delightful; far more so than his most highly-wrought drawings. There is the same serene refinement of feeling, the same tenderness of effect, but with greater purity of colouring and an absence of the too uniform softness of texture, technically called "wooliness." We commend to all persons with a delicate sense of Nature's sweetest harmonies the "Durlstone Head, Dorset" (70), with its beautiful limpid colouring of sea and land; the view at "Havre" (59), with the windmills vanishing in evening mist; and "On Hayward's Heath, Sussex" (260). A view at Rotterdam (29), with a well-expressed evening effect, by Mr. May, is the best work we have seen by this artist.

We have lastly to consider the contributions of a small band of young figure-painters who follow more or less closely in the path struck out by Mr. Walker of the Old Society. Like him, they employ body colour freely, but they do not always succeed in harmonising the various hues admixed with this intractable opaque material, and their productions are always deficient in transparency—i.e., the very essence of pure water-colour painting. Like Mr. Walker also, they pay great attention to figure draughtsmanship and display considerable ability therein—derived from the practice of drawing for the wood engraver. But their outlines (which are almost of necessity an essential feature in a wood engraving) are hard and cutting, and much too strong for the modelling and gradations. We think the methods adopted by this new school to be mistaken; for, on the one hand, they vainly endeavour to attain the qualities of oil painting, and, on the other, their work has characteristics only proper to drawing with the point. Mr. Herkomer is one of the most gifted of these young artists. He sends an "unfinished" fairy fantasia—"Overture" he styles it (73), with numerous semi-nude female figures, under a spectral effect of lighting from a full moon just above the horizon. What may be the motives for the attitudes and contortions of some of the weird figures (if the unearthly conception admits of such definition) it would be hard to say in the present incomplete state of the work. The sense of beauty in form and colour, and the fertility of fancy, which runs over on to the frame, with its tinting and painted butterflies, are, however, not a little remarkable. Another noteworthy drawing, alike as regards form, colour, and invention, is Mr. E. J. Gregory's "Pet of the Crew" (80), a scene on the poop of an antique galley—probably a book illustration put into colour. Mr. W. Small evinces the faculty of a colourist in "Little Bo-Peep" (44), and still more in "The Highland Home" (295), with its rich autumnal hues; but the passages of good colour are fragmentary, owing to the difficulty of laying body colour in broad gradations. The technical procedures of Mr. A. C. Gow and Mr. C. Green are comparatively simple and legitimate; but both are, like the preceding, minutely careful and complete in their workmanship. The former is represented by a small drawing (66) of a man carrying off title-deeds through a secret door behind tapestry; the latter by, among other small drawings, that (351) of an elderly gentleman unlocking the family post-bag, with a young lady standing timidly and anxiously beside his chair.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

There has been something amusing in the sort of perplexity in which two members of the Government have found themselves when addressing their constituents. The President of the Local Government Board and the new Solicitor-General, when they were unofficial representatives of the people, were in a condition, Parliamentarily, comparable to that, physically and morally, "when wild in woods the noble savage ran." They were "chartered libertines," and expressed their broad Radicalism not only without scruple, but with irrepressible chuckling. It is a long time now since Mr. Stansfeld was transformed from a bold Parliamentary free lance into a decorous—a painfully decorous—official; and he affects this by confining himself as much as possible, if not altogether, in the House to the illustration of his department. However, there will come times when even a Cabinet Minister must appear before his constituents like an ordinary member; and this ordeal Mr. Stansfeld has just been undergoing at Halifax. Unfortunately, he was called upon to confine himself to one topic, and could not therefore "dwell in generalities for ever," but to be as specific in his utterances as he could be. The subject was just the most difficult upon which he could suffer a cross-examination, for it was one on which it is known the Cabinet is in a manner divided, Mr. Forster being the leader of one section of opinion and Mr. Bright of the other—namely, that of education. No one, it is presumed, fancies that Mr. Stansfeld is other than an adherent of Mr. Bright, and yet he could not, in loyalty to the rest of the Cabinet, so disclose himself. Therefore, like other people in a dilemma as regards candour, he temporised, referred to his antecedents on the question—so to speak, winked knowingly at his audience when he asked them to trust him, and led them off the scent with a kind of red-herring drag—that is, he hinted that three vexed points in the matter of national education would certainly be dealt with next Session. Of course everyone, at the first blush, deemed this an intimation that the Government would take these points up; but it turns out that it was only meant that three private members would each bring forward a motion on one point, which they endeavoured to do last Session, with a woeeful want of success. Can it be that educational legislation is about to be made an open question in the Cabinet?

In his address to his constituents on asking re-election, when he accepted the Solicitor-Generalship, Sir William Vernon Harcourt gave a good specimen of that kind of supposititious feeling which is symbolised in the answer of bishops-elect, and which is "Nolo Episcopari;" and perhaps his reluctance was as sincere as that which Episcopal apprentices by custom have to affect. He insisted so strongly on the right that electors have to meet their members face to face that he was obliged to take that course after his re-election. It must be confessed that he managed well the situation of a very independent member giving up his independence. He insinuated that he was not going to be muzzled because he had sunk into the position of a subordinate official; he implied that he had not yet become the very humble servant of a Government of which he had only lately been one of the sharpest critics; and loud was his cry that when that fatal hour came that attempts should be made to put an embargo on his freedom of speech he would tear the muzzle from the hand that sought to put it on ere it had touched, far less confined, his mouth. He did, perhaps, protest too much; and, though he spoke roundly, who shall say that he will be able to resist the enervating influence of officialism, and resist the influence of that political and Parliamentary Capua, the Treasury bench? When it is really found that the first day of an attempt to curb his independence is the "last day of his official life," it will be time enough to gauge the depth and width of his protestations to the citizens of Oxford.

The election for Exeter must have been deemed of vital import by the Government, for numerous were the chosen agents who appeared to blarney the cause of the Liberal candidate, and they were not unreasonably supposed to have moved under the instant influence of the responsible managers of the Ministerial party. But the case became clear and undoubted when, at nearly the last moment, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen appeared, and went in vigorously for the support of the Liberal aspirant. Some people may doubt if this was not overdoing the thing. Nobody could doubt the fascination, the sweetness, the brightness of Mr. Hugessen's eloquence; but it is just possible that it may have struck some of the simple, untutored Devonians whom he addressed that confidence in the power of persuading was a little overweening, and that, therefore, a contrary effect to that anticipated was produced, and a spirit of recalcitrancy aroused in many who were before wavering, and that the contest was decided against the Liberal because the people were too much bespeached. Anyway, it was very soon after Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen mixed in the foray that victory declared itself for the Conservative competitor.

Amongst the surprises which were involved in the rearrangement of the Ministry, in the autumn, there was none greater to the initiated than the appointment of Mr. Adam to the Chief Commissionership of Works. Long known and esteemed as second "whip" of the Liberal party, he was possessed of every quality to entitle him to promotion to the chiefship of that department of the Government, on the vacancy occasioned by Lord Wolverton's accession. It may be that Mr. Adam was willing to try his hand in a new office; he might have been weary of "whipping," and have shrunk from the responsibility of the command which the place of Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury involved. All that, if it be so, is buried in the depths of officialism now and for ever; and Mr. Adam has more or less literally sought "fresh fields and pastures new," and takes charge of the parks, and become an inspector of ornamental gardening therein, besides taking on him the heavy burden of all the public buildings, so called, in the metropolis. Far be it from being said that he is not well fitted for his work, and certainly his suavity, his quietude of manner, and his gentle geniality will be appreciated in the conduct of the particular department over which he presides. In a notice of some proceedings of his, the other day, an unconscious joke was made when, he being a Scotchman and his name Adam, and newly appointed Chief Commissioner of Works, it was said that he "was about to macadamise all the roads in the park afresh."

The portrait of the late Mr. E. T. Parris, the artist, published in our last week's Paper, was from a photograph by his son-in-law, Mr. Henri Claudet, of Regent-street, not by Messrs. James Russell and Sons, of Chichester, as then stated. It was taken by Mr. Claudet in 1865.

MUSIC.

The most important event of this week has been the production of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" at the fourth concert of the third season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. This took place on Monday evening, when the gigantic choir and proportionate band, numbering together nearly 1200 executants, gave grand effect to a work which may compare, in sublimity and power, with the better-known St. Matthew "Passion Music" of the same composer. The several recent performances of the latter composition have prepared the English public for the reception of a similar work, one, too, that should also find many repetitions—at least annually at the period for which it was composed. The "Christmas Oratorio" was produced in 1734, some five or six years after the supposed date of the St. Matthew "Passion Music." The oratorio consists of six divisions (intended for church performance on separate days), each of which comprises solo vocal pieces, choruses, and chorales; the choral movements—as in most of the works of Bach, and in those of Handel—being the most impressive. Those which produced the greatest effect in Monday's performance were the fine opening chorus "Christians, be joyful," and those entitled respectively "Glory to God in the highest," "Hear, King of Angels," and "Come and thank Him." The simple sublimity of the old chorales (mostly Lutheran tunes) was also among the impressive features of the performance—these and the other choral pieces having been very finely sung by the choir. The solo pieces, beautiful as many of them are, have frequently a formality of style from which the choruses are entirely free, the former having now an effect of antique conventionalism which scarcely any lapse of time can attach to the latter. The most effective solos were the charming contralto slumber-song "Sleep, my beloved," expressively sung by Madame Patey, the fine baritone air "Lord Almighty," admirably given by Signor Agnesi; and the florid solo "Tis Thee I would be praising," in which Mr. Cummings displayed some excellent vocalisation. In various important incidental soprano passages, and in the two duets (with Signor Agnesi) "Lord, Thy mercy," and "Tis well, Thy name, O Lord," the fine voice and declamation of Madame Otto-Alvsleben were of high value. The orchestral features of the score (with some necessary modifications) were well rendered by an efficient band, and the performance was carefully and judiciously conducted by Mr. Barnby, Dr. Stainer having been a valuable auxiliary at the organ.

The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society have not yet suspended their performances, having announced "The Messiah" for Christmas Eve, concerts being promised in the same building on the afternoon and evening of Boxing Day.

The concert to be given by the Royal Albert Hall Amateur Orchestral Society, this (Saturday) evening, in aid of the funds for reopening the baths and wash-houses in the east end of London will be honoured by the presence of the Duke of Edinburgh and Prince Arthur. The concert will begin at 8.30.

The Saturday afternoon concert at the Crystal Palace closed for the year last week, when the selection was of special interest. One of the chief features of the occasion was Dr. Hans von Bulow's splendid execution of Liszt's elaborate pianoforte concerto in E flat—a work of which we have more than once spoken in reference to its performance by other pianists. The magnificent playing of Dr. von Bulow on Saturday created a marked impression, and called forth enthusiastic applause. The ninth ("choral") symphony of Beethoven formed a grand climax to the last concert of the year. The solo singers in the finale (which includes a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy") were Madame Otto-Alvsleben, Miss M. Severn, Mr. Werrenrath, and Mr. G. Fox. The previous portions of the programme comprised Auber's "Exhibition Overture" and solos by the vocalists named. In the orchestral pieces the band and Mr. Manns (the conductor) fully sustained their reputation.

The last of the Monday Popular Concerts previous to the Christmas vacation took place this week. Dr. von Bulow was again the pianist, and his fine playing was heard in the very opposite styles of Mozart's solo sonata in F (that recently played by him at his third recital), Beethoven's sonata in C minor for piano and violin, and Rubinstein's sonata for piano and violoncello (the latter first introduced at the Popular Concert three weeks ago and repeated by desire). Madame Norman-Néruda was the leading violinist, Signor Piatti the violoncellist, and the quartet party was completed, as usual, by Messrs. L. Ries and Zerbini. Miss Jessie Jones and Mdlle. Reimar were the vocalists, and Sir J. Benedict conducted.

The second concert of the Wagner Society, held yesterday (Friday) week, was far more representative of its purpose than the performances with which the series opened. On that occasion only two pieces by the composer named were given; whereas the programme now referred to comprised extracts from Wagner's "Rienzi" (the overture and the prayer in the fifth act); from "Tannhäuser" (the overture, the introduction to the second act, and "Elizabeth's Greeting"); and from "Lohengrin" (the duet between Elsa and Lohengrin in the third act); besides the "Kaiser March," composed in 1871 in honour of the German Emperor. The vocalists were Mdlle. Nita Gaetano and Herr Werrenrath, each of whom sang with good effect, the former in the prayer from "Rienzi," the latter in "Elizabeth's Greeting," and both in the duet, which latter piece had to be repeated. The Wagner selection (conducted by Mr. Edward Dannreuther) was preceded by the movement entitled "Tasso," from Liszt's "Symphonische Dichtung," and Dr. von Bulow's march from his music to "Julius Caesar," both conducted by the last-named composer. Liszt's elaborate orchestral piece has been more than once commented on by us. The march was given for the first time in this country. It is effectively scored, with copious use of the brass instruments; and was much applauded. The third concert, on Jan. 23, will include choral extracts from Wagner's operas "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," "Tannhäuser," and "Der Fliegende Holländer."

The fifth and last of Mr. Henry Holmes's pleasant Musical Evenings took place on Wednesday, and the programme included Beethoven's sixth string quartet, Brahms's sextet in G for stringed instruments, pianoforte solos performed by Mr. Walter Bache, and other items.

The forty-second annual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" by the Sacred Harmonic Society was repeated yesterday (Friday) evening.

The fifth and last of Dr. von Bulow's pianoforte recitals takes place this (Saturday) afternoon.

Several of our greatest musical institutions have already suspended their performances, according to annual custom, during the period—religious and festive—which closes the old year and opens the new one. The Monday Popular Concerts, those of the Crystal Palace, and of the Sacred Harmonic Society have ceased for a brief period. The first will be resumed on Jan. 12, the Sydenham concerts will be continued on Jan. 17, and those of the last-named institution will recommence on Jan. 23.

A challenge has been sent from the Irish Rifle Association to the riflemen of America, to engage in a friendly contest in the United States in the autumn of 1874.

THEATRES.

Pending the arrangements for the Christmas entertainments, the metropolitan theatres have contributed little to our weekly record that has any special significance. At the Opéra Comique "The Porter's Knot" of Mr. Orenford has been revived, with Mr. H. T. Craven as Samson Burr. It was a bold venture to challenge comparison with our recollections of Mr. Robson; but Mr. Craven has really many qualifications for the character. He is, indeed, a far rougher actor, but enjoys a command over our smiles and tears which few can excel. He can realise the pathetic and humorous with equal facility, and his efforts in both directions were well appreciated. He has been, moreover, efficiently supported by Mr. Belford and Mr. Harry Crouch in the parts of Scatter and Augustus. A Miss Constance also has made her first appearance here in the character of Alice, which she played with a winsome grace that merited and received the approbation of the audience.

The Alexandra Theatre is making some endeavours at establishing its position, and has produced an extravaganza entitled, "In the Clouds; a Glimpse of Utopia," by Mr. Gilbert & Beckett. This gentleman's style of composition is well known. He prefers political allusions to literary wit, and cares little for anything especially dramatic. Satire, he thinks, is equivalent to all the other elements of success put together. It would be in vain, and, indeed, in many respects inconvenient, for us to attempt a detail of the topics out of which it was hoped to provoke a sensation, and to which a fair response enough was returned by the audience; nor is the piece, though clever, likely to command more than ordinary success.

We have also to record the representation of "The Hypocrite" at the Gaiety, for the purpose of exhibiting together for one week Mr. Phelps as Dr. Cantwell and Mr. Toole as Mawworm. So great was the expectation excited by the original announcement that all the chief places in the house have been secured for several weeks, and of course the audiences during the present have been overflowing. Criticism, it is obvious, were superfluous; enough that the realised excellence of the performance fully justified the previous interest which it had excited.

Not much information has yet transpired touching the forthcoming pantomimes; the policy of reticence has seemed the fittest to the various managements. We hear, however, that the subject of the pantomime at the Princess's will be "Little Puss in Boots," which is announced as an extravaganza for children, or "A Fairy Tale of a Cat," at the Surrey, "Jack and the Beanstalk," at Sanger's Grand National Theatre, "Cinderella; or, Harlequin Ride-a-Cockhorse and the Fairy of the Golden Dream," at the Victoria, "The King of Trunks," by Mr. R. Dodson; at the Elephant and Castle, "Harlequin Babes in the Wood, Columbine Queen of the Sky, and the Lady of the Land," written and produced under the superintendence of Mr. T. Mead; at the New Albion, Poplar, "Harlequin Aladdin and the Lamp," written by Mr. G. H. George; and at the Standard, "Whittington and His Cat." At the Crystal Palace, this evening, a new pantomime will be performed, entitled "Puss in Boots; or, Dame Trot and Her Comical Cat, and the Great Ogre Fee-Fo-Fum," written by Mr. E. L. Blanchard.

Mark Twain has delivered a second lecture at the Hanover-square Rooms, entitled "Roughing it on the Silver Frontier." In this he discourses of the State of Nevada and its silver-mines. The reckless life of the miners and the adventures of travellers furnish him with a fund of anecdotes, which, told in his dry, humorous style, provoke the laughter of the audience.

Other lecturers have engaged in various readings. Mr. F. C. Burnand announces his intention to read a selection from his "Happy Thoughts" and other productions, at the new gallery, Argyll-street, Regent-street, commencing next Monday; and Mr. George E. Fairchild began, on Thursday, his readings from Aytoun, Dickens, and others, at St. George's Hall.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

This annual exhibition of live meat for the Londoners' Christmas dinners was held last week, from the Monday to the Friday, at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. It happened most unfortunately that the stifling and chilling fog of those days, mixed with the town smoke, caused much disease among the cattle in the Agricultural Hall. About one hundred animals were consequently removed into the country while the show was going on; but many of them suffered very severely, and several died of disease, while others had to be slaughtered. The show would otherwise have been a very good one. There were 249 entries of cattle (48 more than last year), of which 46 were Devons, 35 Herefords, 65 shorthorns, 33 Sussex, 29 Scotch, Irish, and Welsh, and 19 crossbred. The shorthorns made the finest show ever yet seen.

The beasts represented in our Illustrations, which are drawn by the well-known artist, Mr. Samuel Carter, deserve individual mention. The one in the foreground, at the bottom of the page Engraving, is the ox that won the championship cup, bred and sent by Mr. James Bult, of Dodhill House, Kingston, near Taunton. This magnificent roan ox, four years and two months old, had a girth of 9 ft. 8 in. and a weight of 24 cwt. His sire was the Earl of Fife, and his dam was Bertha Berenice, so as to combine the Bates, Booth, and Knightley blood. The beautiful creature in the middle of the page is the winner of the £40 cup, as the best female in all the classes, and of the £100 champion plate as the best animal of all the cattle, a heifer named Lady Flora, three years and two months old, owned by Mr. John Walter, M.P., of Bearwood, Wokingham. She was bred by Mr. Henry Micklem, of Rosehill, Henley-on-Thames; her sire was the eleventh Baron Wetherby, and her dam was Ringworm, whose sire was Fairleigh. She weighed 18 cwt., or 3½ cwt. more than the first-prize Devon ox, which was one year older. We regret to say that the end of Lady Flora's admired existence was not so happy as we could have wished for one so fair. She was made ill by the fog, and her friends were obliged to kill her on the Thursday morning. But her graceful head is consigned, like that of the Chillingham white bull, to those shifful naturalists, Messrs. James K. Ward and Co., of Piccadilly, to be preserved and handsomely mounted. It will be displayed on an oaken shield, with carved decorations of holly-leaves and other devices, which will form an ornamental trophy in Mr. Walter's mansion. The third animal of the ox kind represented in our Artist's drawings is the first-prize young Devon steer, one aged two years and two weeks, belonging to her Majesty the Queen, and bred on the Prince Consort's model farm at Windsor; his sire was Napier, and his dam was Lavender. In the class of older Devon steers, the prize was taken by Mr. Trevor Lee, senior, of Broughton House, Aylesbury, with one bred from the same dam at Southmolton.

The show of sheep was the largest that has yet taken place, numbering 188 entries; the Leicesters, Southdowns, and others were of more than average excellence. In the enumeration of those which appear in our Engraving, we first take the sheep that stand in the foreground. These are fat wethers of the Oxfordshire breed, twenty-one months old, from Woodstock, bred and exhibited by the Duke of Marlborough, who thereby won the first prize and the £20 cup, for the best in the Oxfordshire, Shropshire, and crossbred classes. Those in the background, at the top of the page, are the Southdown fat wethers of Lord Walsingham, from Thetford Hall, Norfolk, twenty months old, which took the first prize and silver cup in their class, and the champion plate of £50, as the best sheep in the whole show. There was an extraordinary sheep in the extra stock, a Lincolnshire wether, thirty-three months old, weighing 3 cwt. 2 qr. 20 lb.; this was bred by Mr. John Byron, of Kirkby-green, Sleaford, and won the extra-stock prize.

With respect to pigs, the show was not so good as on some former occasions; but there were some very good. Two of a pen of three, under twelve months old, exhibited by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, are represented by our Artist; but the mass of wholesome fat pork in the rear is one of the black improved Dorsets, aged eighteen months, bred by Mr. Charles M'Niven, of Oxford, Godstone, which gained the champion £20 cup as the best pigs in the Agricultural Hall. Of the pigs under nine months of age, Mr. John Biggs, of Leighton Buzzard, showed wonderful Berkshires; and the Marquis of Ailesbury won honours in this class.

The fog, which sickened so many of the oxen, kept thousands of people from the show. The number of visitors on Monday was 1120, or 200 above last year; on Tuesday, 14,500, or 8000 short of last year; on Wednesday, 31,652, or 12,700 short; on Thursday, 13,900, or 22,200 below last year; and on Friday not 3500, or fully 11,000 short: making the total for the week under 64,700, whereas last year the total was 118,975. The amount taken in shillings at the doors was £4328, which is £1817 less than last year.

The show of agricultural machines and implements was viewed, perhaps, with the greater interest, on account of the late disputes concerning the wages of farm labourers. Messrs. Howard, of Bedford; Ransome, of Ipswich; Fowler, of Leeds; and many other distinguished manufacturers, sent a variety of useful mechanical servants for the work of husbandry.

One of the "Howard Safety Boilers" was exhibited, with special appliances for diminishing the risk arising from neglect—an important advantage, as tending to secure absolute safety in working. In an ordinary Cornish boiler the quantity of water contained is from fifteen to twenty tons, each cubic foot of which exceeds a pound of gunpowder in explosive power. In such boilers as these the danger mainly consists in the vast accumulation of power in one large vessel. They are, in fact, like great magazines, and the wholesale destruction which attends their explosion cannot be a matter of surprise. Of course absolute immunity from explosions of some kind will never be realised, as even the candle bomb, which contains but a few drops of water, is a dangerous toy. It may be taken as an axiom that the highest degree of safety in the generation of steam is only to be obtained by the use of tubes or vessels of small sectional area; hence the numerous attempts which have been made to construct boilers of the tubulous class. Nothing seems easier than to do this, and so to subdivide the magazine into a number of chambers or cells that the bursting of any one of them would be comparatively harmless. We believe, however, that in no instance until the introduction of the "Howard Safety Boiler" was commercial success realised in this direction. The reasons for this want of success hitherto have been the mechanical difficulties and the widely-different conditions under which steam generators are expected to work, to which may be added the opposition encountered at every step from the advocates of stereotyped forms of boiler. The use of the Howard safety boiler has gone very far to settle the following important points—viz., that for every manufacturing purpose tubulous boilers may be worked with the advantages of safety and economy, and that the hard deposits which in ordinary boilers are a source of great trouble crack and scale off the small tubes from the expansion and contraction. If these advantages are confirmed by still wider practical tests, we may look for a cessation from the manufacture of those boilers which, in the event of explosion, scatter ruin on every side. It appears that some 700 of the Howard safety boilers are now successfully in use on land. The Barrow Shipbuilding Company (Limited), of which the Duke of Devonshire is chairman, are about to develop the principle for marine purposes; and it is expected that shortly one of the company's vessels trading between Barrow and Belfast will be fitted with the Howard boilers.

A new hall, erected at a cost of £25,000, intended for the performance of high-class musical works, was opened at Sheffield, on Monday, by Mr. Joseph Hallam, the Mayor. Mr. Best gave a recital on the organ, which has cost £5000.

The office of Blue Mantle Pursuivant of Arms, vacant by the promotion of Mr. Henry Harington Molyneux-Seel to be Richmond Herald, has, it appears from Tuesday's Gazette, been given to Mr. Edward Bellasis, barrister-at-law.

At a meeting of the Lord Provost and magistrates of Edinburgh, held on Monday night, it was resolved, on the occasion of the Duke of Edinburgh's marriage, to illuminate the Castle Hill and other prominent heights with "padellas," to have bonfires on Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Craigs, and to illuminate the public offices. It was agreed to recommend all public bodies to light up their buildings. It was also determined that there should be a banquet for the people in the Corn Exchange, and that another should be arranged for a certain number of the citizens and the council.

The useful and beautiful pocket-books of the year published by Messrs. De la Rue and Co. have, as usual, made their appearance in good time. Those prepared for the ladies are prettier than ever; there is a little one, about three inches by two, in a flexible binding of bright green morocco, with silk lining, which is a perfect gem; and one of middling size, in soft leather of a light fawn-colour, will suit a graver feminine taste. Each contains the "indelible diary and memorandum-book," with the calendar or almanack, and some accessory notes. There are two or three editions of the tablet form, which is handy for writing; and the desk diary will serve for use in the counting-house, office, or study.—Messrs. Letts and Co. have also provided, with the same completeness as in former years, for the convenience of business men and housekeepers wanting a practical day-book.—The "City Diary" of Messrs. Collingridge, interleaved with blotting-paper, is very cheap, and is well adapted to record the engagements of a London tradesman.—A little twopenny almanack, compiled by Mr. Samuel Walker, photographer, of Margaret-street, is meant for a Sunday companion at church, as it contains the lectionary, or list of all the Scriptural lessons to be read throughout the year, which may thus be found in the Bible ready for the clergyman to begin.—"Punch's Pocket-Book" for 1874 is comical as might be expected with the aid of Mr. Tenniel, Mr. Keene, and other artists, and of the witticists who flourish a funny pen. The coloured frontispiece is a peep into the School of Cookery, in which the virtues of courtship and conjugal happiness seem to be included.

ROUTLEDGE'S EVERY BOY'S ANNUAL

FOR 1876. Edited by EDMUND ROUTLEDGE. With Illustrations by Coloured Plates.

"Every boy who is a boy of good taste will be sure to look forward to the publication of 'Every Boy's Annual' with interest. This year's volume is published, and it is in every way equal to every year which it has preceded it, alike in its letterpress and in the illustrations by which it is accompanied. The stories are all calculated well for the taste of boys; and there are besides innumerable topics likely to be of interest to them. Chess, cricket, all sorts of games and outdoor amusements are fully described, and there are besides puzzles and a good deal of useful information, for which the youngsters will be a good deal the better. The book is altogether very handsomely got up, and is a perfect repository of amusement for boys."—Scotsman.

WALTER CRANE'S NEW TOY-BOOK.

With 64 Pages of Plates drawn by Walter Crane, and printed in Colours by Edmund Evans.

"The drawings are for the most part very spirited and very amusing, as well as can be to the young pictures which are far too common; thought quite good enough for those whose taste has yet to be cultivated."—Saturday Review.

"Colouring highly and wisely used gives pictorial art of the salubrity of Mr. Walter Crane's new toy book. His new series of finely-coloured, cleverly-designed children's books . . . are in every respect worthy of the artist."—Athenaeum.

Walter Crane is an old favourite. The illustrations, printed by Mr. Edmund Evans, are clever and original. . . Manchester Examiner.

"The plates, in most instances, are simply delightful in the grim humour, startling reality, and clever grouping; we keep turning to them again and again, and each time to find a new detail that has escaped us."—These pictures are, to our mind, undoubtedly the best that could be had before, and derived after a manner that is likely to develop the embryo artist of the nursery. . . Examiner.

"Sixty-four marvellous plates."—Sunday Times.

"Curiously quaint, and exquisitely pleasing."—Scotsman.

S. T. JAMES'S GREAT HALL. REGENT-STREET AND PICCADILLY.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW-YEAR'S HOLIDAYS, 1873-4.

THE MOORE AND BURGESS MINSTRELS' NINTH ANNUAL SERIES of Performances specially prepared for the Festive Period,

EVERY DAY AT THREE, EVERY NIGHT AT EIGHT, until WEDNESDAY, JAN. 7, 1874, inclusive, after which date the Performances will be resumed in their regular order.

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND MAGNIFICENT PROSCENIUM erected expressly for these performances, the mechanical department by Mr. J. Matthews; the proscenium and scenery painted by the eminent artist, Mr. Richard Douglas. The hall will present a dazzling coup-d'oeil of beauty never before witnessed here. The Entertainments will present all those bright and salient features for which the entertainments of the Moore and Burgess Minstrels have so many years past been distinguished, maintaining its proud pre-eminence as the most charming and attractive performance to be found amid the entire round of metropolitan amusements. The aspect of the Great St. James's Hall during the series of holiday performances is invariably one of the most extraordinary sights in London, the vast area of this magnificent hall being densely crowded in every available space from floor to roof, notwithstanding the fact of there being ample accommodation for nearly four thousand persons.

The Day Performances are precisely the same in every detail as those given at night, but terminating in time to admit of visitors whose time is limited dining comfortably, and afterwards going to any of the theatres at night.

Doors open daily at Two and Seven. Fautouille, 5s.; Sofa Stalls, 3s.; Balcony, 2s. Area and Upper Gallery, 1s. Children under twelve half price to Balcony and Stalls only.

Places may be secured at Mitchell's, 33, Old Bond-street; Hays', Royal Exchange; Keith Prowse, Cornhill; and Austin's Office, St. James's Hall. No fees or extra charges whatsoever.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1873.

The year of grace 1873 is about to take leave of us. On Wednesday next, at midnight, it will have ceased to be, and will have taken its place with its departed predecessors. What character will it leave behind it? With what associations will memory connect it? To many an individual mind, doubtless, it will stand out from all foregoing years for some great sorrow, or some crowning joy or triumph of life. But it is not in reference to private experience that we venture to make the inquiry. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger intermeddeth not with its joy." No; but some things happen to us all in common, and what things, and of what kind, those have been during the twelvemonth just coming to a close most of us are prompted by something better than a mere idle curiosity to recall.

During its rapid flight A.D. 1873 has witnessed comparatively little which will be hereafter remembered to the credit of what we call the civilised world. No great war, it is true, has swept with devastation the face of the earth; no wide-spread insurrection of class against class has cast its lurid light upon the violence of human passions; no overwhelming calamity has crushed the hopes, or tried the endurance, or evoked the heroism of nations. But throughout the year, nevertheless, there has been—now in one country, then in another, sometimes in several simultaneously—a seething of the public mind and a turbulent unreasonableness of will in regard to public affairs which few can look back upon without sorrowfully observing how little has been the moral progress of our race even under what are usually accounted the greatest advantages. Take, for example, the history of France from January last. What does it exhibit to us? Look at the overthrow of M. Thiers just when he had completed a provision for paying the last instalment of the war indemnity, and succeeded in his diplomatic arrangements for the evacuation of the French soil by German troops; at the elevation of Marshal MacMahon to the Presidency of the Republic; at the fusion of the two Bourbon families with a view to a Monarchical restoration; at the Chambord negotiations and their collapse; and at the subsequent course of the Royalist majority of the National Assembly at Versailles;—is it possible to watch the protracted game of unreason as unfolded in these shifting scenes, without feeling one's heart ache over the infatuated perversity of even the most intellectually cultivated of our species? Or take Spain, as she has showed herself to the world during the last twelve months—the abdication of Amadeus, the proclamation of the Republic, the unpatriotic abnegation of their political position and duties by the aristocracy, the Carlist war, the episode at Carthage, and the almost universal dislocation of society—we do not care to deny the virtues which this general scramble of selfishness has brought into relief even in Spain; but it must be admitted, we fear, that the course of affairs in the Peninsula during 1873 has not been such as to give Europe cause to remember it with pride. The Vienna Exhibition—notwithstanding the visit paid to it by crowned heads—was peculiarly a failure, which is a matter of common regret. And yet Austria will, perhaps, reap a richer harvest at some no very distant day from the labours she has bestowed on this pacific enterprise than will Prussia from the repressive ecclesiastical policy she has so persistently and unflinchingly pursued, or Russia from her romantic but successful expedition to Khiva.

Our own foreign policy during the year has been quiet, and, as we think, dignified, and it is to be hoped we have retained the esteem of all our civilised neighbours. Possibly, the discussion which has been raised in several European capitals, on the practicability and expediency of substituting arbitration for war in the settlement of international disputes, may tend to results which will cause posterity to look back upon 1873 with gratitude. At any rate, efforts made in this direction will make a more grateful impression in after times than the Ashantee war, inevitable as it may have been; and whatever may be the success of Sir Garnet Wolseley on the West Coast of Africa, and whatever laurels he may deservedly reap in achieving it, our children's children will attach more importance to, and it may be will feel a far more thrilling interest in, those annals which record the mission of Sir Bartle Frere to Zanzibar, Muscat, and Bombay, and the expedition of Sir S. Baker into the regions beyond Egypt for the suppression of the trade in slaves, than will be quickened by any career of victory over savage tribes.

The domestic history of the United Kingdom in 1873 presents no tableau of stirring political events. Parliament, of course, has had its exciting incidents, and has got through some valuable work; but, taken as a whole—especially as compared with some of its predecessors—the Session was dull and unproductive. It met on Feb. 6. The first great measure put before it was a bill for the creation, on the principle of religious equality, of a single University for Ireland, to be open to all comers. Elaborately framed, introduced by one of Mr. Gladstone's most magnificent speeches, and honestly intended to do justice to all parties, it was found, on subsequent examination, to have aimed at a reconciliation of claims intrinsically incompatible, and, after long debate, was rejected by a majority of three. A Ministerial resignation, a refusal of the Conservative chiefs to take office, the reinstatement of the Gladstone Administration, and a quasi-provisional transaction of the bulk of Parliamentary business, followed this critical vote. An overflowing Exchequer, fortunately, furnished abundant means for a popular Budget. Provision for paying out of the year's revenue one half of the Alabama indemnity, the reduction of the income tax by a penny in the pound sterling, and of the sugar duties by a penny in the pound weight, and the exemption of hotel proprietors from the tax on servants, were accepted as, on the whole, a fair distribution of the surplus. The Railway and Canal Traffic Bill, Mr. Fawcett's Dublin University Bill, and, above all, Lord Selborne's Court of Judicature Bill—all of which were passed—redeemed the Session of 1873 from the charge of barrenness. No sooner was Parliament prorogued than a considerable reconstruction of the Government was announced, a prominent feature of which was Mr. Bright's return to the Cabinet.

Outside the range of politics a few noteworthy incidents have imparted interest to the year just expiring. Amongst these the first place is due to the visit of the Shah of Persia, on which occasion England for once did the honours of a host—perhaps with too great fussiness, but with satisfaction to her guest as well as to herself. Then, her Majesty's visit to Victoria Park, eliciting as it did such exuberant loyalty from the inhabitants of the East End of London, will be regarded by all her subjects as worth remembering. The Tichborne case, perhaps the longest trial on record, will also for a long time hence give distinction to the passing year. Unhappily, there are some other events of a more painful character to record. Yet who can give even a meagre summary of the railway accidents which have taken place almost daily during the last twelve months? At sea, the running down of the Northfleet by the Murillo, the wreck of the Atlantic, and the collision of the Ville du Havre and the Lochearn, are forced upon our notice as tragical illustrations of the perils of the deep. Nor, perhaps, in connection with the deplorable accidents of the year, should we omit all mention of the destruction of the Alexandria

Palace by fire, within a few days after the imposing ceremony by which it was opened to the public.

Commercially and financially A.D. 1873 has been of a very chequered character. Strikes on a large scale, high prices, dear coals, a deficient harvest, a monetary panic in America, a sudden rise of discount at the Bank, and the prospect of a fearfully extensive famine in Bengal, have pressed not a little upon the springs of industry and trade in England, though as yet their combined force has not led to disastrous results. Possibly it may be left to the coming year to develop them.

We must not conclude this bird's-eye sketch without some reference to the more conspicuous personages whom, during the progress of the year, death has carried off from this earthly stage of being. Napoleon III. leads the mournful procession, both in regard to the time of his decease and to the eminence of his position. John Stuart Mill leaves a vacancy in the class of intellectual thinkers which the present generation is hardly likely to fill up. Among divines, the Bishop of Winchester; among lawyers, Lord Westbury and Chief Justice Chase (of the United States); and among artists, Sir Edwin Landseer, claim a tribute of respectful remembrance. Lord Ossington, the late Speaker of the House of Commons, survived his retirement from that post of dignity but a brief while; and Mr. Charles Knight, the veteran publisher in bygone generations, after having achieved great things in popularising literature, departed this life, full of years, and with high contemporary appreciation. We might extend this list, but our remarks have already gone beyond the limits ordinarily assigned to us. With sentiments of solemnity befitting the occasion, we bid farewell to A.D. 1873.

THE COURT.

The Queen's dinner party on Wednesday week included Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Prince Leopold, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Ely, Lord and Lady Augustus Loftus, and the Earl and Countess of Breadalbane. On the following day the Bishop of Ely was presented to the Queen at Windsor Castle and did homage on his appointment. On Tuesday her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, left the castle for Osborne House, Isle of Wight. The suite in attendance consisted of Lady Waterpark, the Marchioness of Ely, the Hon. Horatia Stopford, Major-General H. F. Ponsonby, Major-General Lord Alfred Paget, Colonel H. Lynedoch Gardiner, Mr. Sahl, Mr. Collins, and Dr. Marshall. The Queen travelled by the Great Western and South-Western railways via Basingstoke to Gosport. General Viscount Trenchard and Rear-Admiral Sir Leopold M'Clistock received the Queen at Clarence-yard, where her Majesty embarked on board the Alberta, Captain the Prince of Leiningen, and crossed the Solent to East Cowes, arriving at Osborne shortly after two o'clock. On Sunday the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service, performed at Osborne House by the Rev. George Prothero. Sir William Jenner, who arrived the previous day, left Osborne. Her Majesty, with the members of the Royal family, has walked and driven out daily.

The Queen has approved the following elevations to the Peerage:—Vice-Admiral the Hon. Edward Granville George Howard, the heir presumptive to the earldom of Carlisle, as Baron Lanerton of Lanerton, in the county of Cumberland; the Lord Chief Justice Clerk of Scotland, as Baron Moncreiff, of Tulibole, in the county of Kinross; the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, as Baron Coleridge, of Ottery St. Mary, in the county of Devon; the Right Hon. W. Monnell, M.P., as Baron Emly, of Tervoe, in the county of Limerick.

Her Majesty has consented to become patroness of the Association in Aid of the Deaf and Dumb, St. Saviour's Church, Oxford street.

The Queen was represented by Lord Otho Fitzgerald at the funeral of the late Queen Dowager of Prussia at Berlin, and the Prince of Wales by Lieutenant-Colonel Teesdale. The following were the orders for the Court's going into mourning on Saturday last for her late Majesty. The ladies to wear black dresses, white gloves, black or white shoes, feathers and fans, pearls, diamonds, or plain gold or silver ornaments. The gentlemen to wear black Court dress, with black swords and buckles. The Court to change the mourning on Saturday, Jan. 3 next—viz., the ladies to wear black dresses, with coloured ribbons, flowers, feathers, and ornaments, or grey or white dresses with black ribbons, flowers, feathers, and ornaments; the gentlemen to continue the same mourning; and on Saturday, Jan. 10 next, the Court to go out of mourning.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales returned to Marlborough House, on Saturday last, from visiting Lord and Lady Rendlesham at Rendlesham Hall, Woodbridge. Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse dined with their Royal Highnesses at Marlborough House. On Sunday the Prince and Princess partook of luncheon with Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse at Buckingham Palace. The Prince and Princess have rejoined their family at Sandringham. The Prince will unveil the statue of the Prince Consort on the Holborn Viaduct on Jan. 9. His Royal Highness, accompanied by the Princess, will leave England on the following day for St. Petersburg, in order to be present at the marriage of the Duke of Edinburgh.

Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse-Darmstadt, accompanied by Princess Irene, Prince Ernest, and Princess Alix, arrived at Buckingham Palace on Friday week from Windsor Castle. On Sunday their Royal Highnesses, with their children, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Wales to Charing-cross station, left London upon their return to Germany. The Royal travellers proceeded by the South-Eastern Railway to Dover, and passed the night at the Lord Warden Hotel, embarking the following morning on board the special steamer Samphire, Captain Goldsack, for Ostend, en route for Darmstadt. A Royal salute was fired from the castle. The principal officers of the garrison were in attendance, and a guard of honour of the 90th Foot was drawn up on the pier.

The Duke of Edinburgh went to the Globe Theatre on Monday. His Royal Highness is expected to leave for St. Petersburg on the 30th inst.

Prince and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein left Witley Court on Saturday last on their return to Cumberland Lodge, Windsor.

Prince Arthur went to the Vaudeville Theatre on Monday.

His Excellency Count Beust left Belgrave-square on Saturday last for Dover en route for Altenburg Castle, Saxony. In his absence Count Walkenstein acts as chargé d'affaires.

His Excellency Don Juan T. Comyn, formerly Spanish Minister at this Court, has arrived, with Madame Comyn, at the Spanish Legation, St. George's-place, Hyde Park-corner.

The Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe have arrived at Floors Castle.

The Duke and Duchess of Marlborough and Ladies Rosamond and Anne Spencer Churchill have left Blenheim Palace for Brighton.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford, accompanied by the Marquis of Tavistock and the Ladies Russell, have arrived at Woburn Abbey from visiting the Earl and Countess of Derby at Knowley.

The Duchess (Eleanor) of Northumberland has arrived at Alnwick Castle, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry have arrived at Wynyard Park, Durham, from Wales.

The Earl and Countess of Kimberley have returned to Kimberley Hall, Norfolk.

SOLDIERS' WIVES.

In Kingsley's pathetic song of "The Three Fishers," a melancholy refrain continues to repeat the observation that "men must work, while women must weep." But, though a wife may well be expected to mourn if her husband be drowned outside the moaning bar of the harbour in sight of their native village, it is not for his working that she has cause for sorrow, but for his ceasing to work and to live. The soldier's wife, too, may be of the same mind with the sailor's, in tolerating the special risks or dangers of her brave partner's calling and service, as well as the long periods of his absence from home, in consideration of the real dignity that belongs to a worthy performance of duties calling into active exercise the best moral and physical powers of robust manhood. "And men must fight, though women may weep," is a remark that sounds quite as appropriate, in the present condition of humanity, as that doleful lamentation over the accidental perils of industry. But in spite of another old song called "Jeannette and Jeannot," which one used to hear from good young ladies at the pianoforte, in the days of the peace congress, too many years ago, before the revolutionary movements in Europe had revived the slumbering enmities of rival nations, we rather suspect that the total abolition of soldiery would scarcely be approved by a majority of votes among the gentler sex. They have certainly had their full share, since a date long before Helen of Troy, in provoking the homicidal conflicts of armed multitudes. The women of our own day are still addicted to the old habit of testifying their particular admiration of the military class, not upon the patriotic ground of public usefulness, but simply upon their presumed superior gallantry, their credentials of masculine strength and courage, and the chivalrous smartness of their figure and address. Far be it from us, modest civilians, who mildly walk the street in our plain black coats, with our pacific umbrellas, though some of us will don a volunteer's grey tunic and shoukier an Enfield rifle at evening drill, to dispute the prize of female favour with the stalwart wearers of a scarlet uniform and a sword-bayonet, or with the officers who are entitled to appear in martial attire, as on parade, wherever the fashions of English society permit such a professional display. We are humbly conscious of the personal disadvantage at which the best of us—tradesmen, clerks, artists, doctors, or lawyers—must be supposed to stand in the esteem of Miss Adeline or Miss Maud and their sisters, compared with any captain, or even corporal, who has been trained to the noble art of war. These observations are made in no spirit of envious irony to justify our suggestion that the married women whose husbands are now and then obliged to go abroad for the business of lawful fighting are not devoid of peculiar arguments for their consolation derived from their pride in being "soldiers' wives." Those whom the reader sees in kindly talk with each other beside the cot of an innocent babe, depicted in our front-page Engraving, are women of different social rank: the one is a lady of refined education and the wife of a distinguished officer; the other, with a heart as true, is the wife of Private Jones, No. 89 in his company of the regiment. But we can well believe that they have a thorough mutual sympathy in the anxious, not despondent, feelings with which they have just bidden farewell to the men who are now gone where duty calls them.

A donation of £100 has been presented to the Metropolitan Visiting and Relief Association, 21, Regent-street, by Messrs. Truman, Hanbury, and Co.

In the scullers' race between Kilsby and Hambledon, watermen, on Monday, the Lambeth champion shot ahead almost from the first, and won by six lengths.

The elections of representatives in the Court of Common Council for the twenty-six wards into which the City is divided took place on Monday. They were for the most part uncontested.

The rewards at the Greenwich Royal Naval School were, on Monday, distributed by Rear-Admiral Beauchamp Seymour, C.B., one of the Lords of the Admiralty.

At a meeting of the Dublin Chamber of Commerce, held on Monday, a resolution was passed in favour of a central railway station in Dublin. The total expense of the station is estimated at £750,000.

Last Saturday evening the presentation of prizes to the 3rd City of London Rifle Volunteers was made at Guildhall by the Lady Mayoress—the Lord Mayor presiding, in his full official robes. A similar ceremony in connection with the 37th Middlesex Rifles took place at Freemasons' Hall. The prizes won by the 36th Middlesex were distributed yesterday week by Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon Ives, the commanding officer, in St. James's Hall.—Mr. Goschen was a guest at the annual dinner of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers on Monday, and Mr. Brassey occupied the chair. In his speech the First Lord of the Admiralty strongly commended naval volunteering to the youth of our large seaports as a patriotic and healthy employment of their leisure hours.

The Daily Telegraph has received advices from the Gold Coast to the 5th of this month. The Ashantees were then in full retreat over the Pra, and our camp was at Mansu. Thither on the 1st inst. Sir Garnet Wolseley, accompanied by Commodore Hewett, proceeded, intending to return to Cape Coast Castle to spend Christmas. Sickness still prevailed at the Castle, and most of the marines landed from the Simoom had been down with fever. It was expected that Glover's expedition would begin active operations up the Volta on the 15th inst. by an attack on the Awoonae. From Madeira we learn that the Tamar and the Thames, with troops on board for the Gold Coast, have been sighted off Sierra Leone and Funchal.

FINE ARTS.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

The present winter exhibition of the Society of British Artists is increased numerically to the proportions of the summer shows, in the same rooms (all of which are now occupied), and, as might be expected, the standard is proportionately lowered. To attempt a detailed notice of the exhibition would be a task not less unprofitable than ungrateful and wearisome. The limited number of members of respectable ability are usually better represented in the summer show; and of the few other contributors of merit we have generally an opportunity of noticing better or more important examples in our reviews of the now numerous exhibitions throughout the year. It may suffice, therefore, to simply give the names (in the order in which they occur in the catalogue) of those artists whose works we have marked as worthy of attention—viz., J. Peel, W. L. Wyllie, G. S. Walters, H. Moore, A. Parsons, V. W. Bromley, E. Hayes, C. W. Wyllie, W. J. Hennessy, L. Thompson, P. P. Pugin, D. Pasmore, H. King, T. O. Hume, T. R. Miles, C. Bauerlé, H. H. Couldery, J. Aumonier, C. Jones, H. T. Dawson, jun., H. Lengo, E. van Heemskerke, J. E. Newton, D. Cameron, G. F. Teniswood, A. F. Grace, M. Meucci, W. Tennison, T. C. Griswold, and R. T. Landells.

Mr. J. Pettie has been elected a Royal Academician in place of Sir Edwin Landseer.

M. J. D. Crittenden has just completed a bust of Thomas Carlyle.

Mr. R. Jackson also has completed the model for a marble bust of Mr. Irving, the actor, of which report speaks favourably.

A number of new water-colour drawings, comprised in the "Ellison Gift," are on view in the South Kensington Museum.

Mr. Adams-Aiton has completed the model for a marble bust of the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon. The sculptor has been remarkably successful in his treatment of a difficult subject.

A very interesting collection of nearly four hundred groups of modelled and stuffed animals by the celebrated taxidermist, Herr Ploucquet, of Stuttgart, is on view at the Crystal Palace, in the gallery above the Egyptian Court.

The fine painting, by M. Wauters, of Mary of Burgundy interceding with the magistrates of Ghent for the pardon of her advisers Hugonet and D'Humbercourt, which we engraved about two years back, has been presented to the city of Liège.

The Crystal Palace Company again offer a number of medals in competition for the best works that may be contributed to the picture-gallery at Sydenham for the exhibition of the ensuing year. The medals include six in gold, twenty in silver, and a proportionate number in bronze. Pictures intended for exhibition will be received for transmission to the palace at the Hanover-square Rooms on Feb. 17 and 18 next. Further particulars may be obtained by applying to the superintendent of the gallery, Mr. C. W. Wass.

A very elaborate engraving, after the picture by Herr Scholtz, of the "Last Banquet of the Generals of Wallenstein" has lately been completed by Herr Kracker, who has been occupied six years on the work. The publisher for England is Mr. Bruckmann, of Henrietta-street. The same publisher is rendering good service to English connoisseurs and artists by introducing into this country a noble series of photographs from the pictures in the Belvedere Gallery at Vienna, and other of the admirable German photographs from works of art.

At the gallery, 9, Conduit-street, is being exhibited a complete collection of Mrs. Cameron's photographs, including all her portraits of eminent men, beautiful women, and character-portraits, her "fancy subjects," and studies of single figures and groups. The collection comprises portraits of so many of the leading men of the age that it will well repay a visit, if only on the ground of personal interest. But Mrs. Cameron's photographs are, besides, unrivalled from an artistic point of view. We have, however, repeatedly acknowledged their rare merits, and need not, therefore, review them anew.

At Mr. McLean's gallery in the Haymarket is now on view a collection of ceramic decorative works which well illustrate the development which the art of painting on pottery has received of late years in this country as well as abroad. The decorations are original designs painted in nearly all cases by the designer himself directly on the plate, plaque, vase, &c. Among the designers are the distinguished artists Messrs. W. S. Coleman, H. S. Marks, Ludovici, Lessore, Solon-Miles, and Bouquet; and the Misses Rebecca and Helen C. Coleman. The designs, which include figure, floral, and other subjects, are often charmingly fanciful and eminently beautiful as arrangements of colour. All that appears to be wanting for this branch of decorative art to take high rank is a higher and purer ideal of form in the figures.

The gold medal and a scholarship of £25 for two years have been awarded by the Royal Academy of Arts to Frederick George Cotman and William White—to the former for the best historical painting, and to the latter for the best historical sculpture. Ernest Albert Waterlow receives the gold (Turner) medal for the best landscape. Silver medals are awarded as follows:—To Joseph Mordecai, for the best painting from the life, and the best copy in the school of painting; to William Doffarn, for the best drawing from the life; to Michael Hanhart, for the second best drawing from the life; to William H. Thornycroft, for the third best drawing from the life; to William G. S. Webber, for the best model from the life; to Elizabeth Smith Guinness, for the best drawing from the antique; to H. A. Bone, for the second best drawing from the antique; to Jane Archer, for the third best drawing from the antique; to William S. Frith, for the best model from the antique; to William Charles May, for the second best model from the antique; to Caroline Noltidge, for the best restoration of the "Venus de Milo"; to Edward Clarke, for the best architectural drawing; to George L. Luker, for the second best architectural drawing; and to Philippe Maroni, for the best perspective drawing. The premium of £10 is awarded to W. R. Symonds for a drawing executed in the antique style.

The friends of John Stuart Mill have obtained the sanction of the Board of Works for their proposal to erect a statue to him at the western end of the gardens on the Victoria Embankment.

The certificates awarded to the successful students in the Crystal Palace Company's school of practical engineering were distributed, last Saturday, by Mr. Bazalgette, C.B., who expressed great satisfaction at the progress of the students, and spoke highly of the system of training pursued in the school.

Leicester-square has furnished the text of another discussion in the Metropolitan Board of Works. A report was received from the committee intrusted with the preparation of a bill for enabling the board to acquire possession of the square. A general hope was expressed that Parliament would suspend its standing orders to allow this urgent measure to pass next Session.

CHRISTMAS MARKETING.

The bustle of laying in the required stock of kitchen, cellar, and cupboard stores for the convivial comforts of jolly old Christmas is the occasion of much pleasant excitement in a middle-class household, where the mistress is not above going herself to market, and willing to let her children go with her. It may possibly happen, too, that the husband and father can spare an hour of his working day to accompany the wife of his youth upon this agreeable errand, in which she is likely to find good cause for levying upon his ready purse a few shillings of extra taxation. For the purchase of a turkey and sausages, with herbs for stuffing, and a round quantity of suet, raisins, and currants for the plum-pudding, with aromatic spices, and oranges and lemons, not to speak of a bottle of cognac brandy, has often come to more money than the amount of her previous estimate. The grocer and the poulterer now assure her that everything is very scarce and dear; but it is only for once in the year she is called upon to indulge in this particular display of culinary extravagance. And the arrears may perhaps be made up in future by nearly a week's dining (only herself and the children, for he takes his chop in town) on the remains of a Sunday boiled leg of mutton, to be served cold on the Monday and Tuesday, part hashed on the Wednesday, and part, with the bone, incorporated in a stew of meat and vegetables, which will not be wholly consumed on the Thursday, but will reappear on the Friday's table. Saturday afternoon permits her husband to dine at home; there shall be a dish of cutlets for him on that day, and the Sunday joint, for a wholesome change, will be a piece of beef or pork tolerably roasted, which may or may not be followed by an apple-pie. Such is life! and he would be an ungrateful fellow who should presume to murmur at this fare provided from an income of £300 or £400 a year, with several boys and girls to be fed, as well as to be clothed and schooled, besides the house-rent and other current costs of a modest domestic establishment. The prudent householder may well perpend. It is Christmas-time, just now, and the quarterly and the annual bills are lying ready in the desks of his legitimate creditors, to be let fly at his devoted head in the first week of the New Year. But let him thank God if he has wherewith to pay, and attend his wife's Christmas marketing with a cheerful heart.

"LA NOTTE."

"La Notte," or "The Night," which we engrave as a fitting art-illustration for this Christmas-tide, this Festival of the Nativity, is the most celebrated of several chefs-d'œuvre by Correggio in the Dresden Gallery. Nowhere out of Parma are there so many and such excellent examples of the great Italian, and this picture is generally adduced before all others in support of Correggio's claim to be regarded as the greatest master of chiaroscuro. This rare charm in art is here exemplified by the exquisite manner in which the light emanating from the Divine Infant is conducted. The supernatural light beams full on the ecstatic face of the Virgin, yet she is undazzled by it; while another female draws back, screening her eyes by her hand, as though unable to endure the radiance; it brightly illumines the angels above, and it touches more softly the rude faces and forms of the shepherds. There is a second but fainter light in the picture, that of early dawn just breaking over the distant hills—emblem of the "day spring from on High." The conception of representing light as radiating on all sides, not from a lantern or candle, but from the newborn celestial Child, is eminently poetical, though not exactly Correggio's own invention, as is commonly supposed; albeit the manner in which the effects of this light is rendered is, as we have said, all his own. But we shall not attempt to rival the art-critic of "The Vicar of Wakefield" in dwelling on the "Correggiosity of Correggio." We may, however, quote, as a just and trustworthy commentary on this famous masterpiece, the remarks by Wilkie, who saw the picture when it had already suffered greatly from over-cleaning:—"The Notte" of Correggio is what I expected the most from, and the condition of which has given me the greatest disappointment; yet, how beautiful the arrangement! All the powers of the art are here united to make a perfect work. Here the simplicity of the drawing of the Virgin and Child is shown in contrast with the foreshortening of the group of angels—the strongest unity of effect with the most perfect system of intricacy. The emitting the light from the Child through a supernatural illusion is eminently successful: it looks neither forced nor improbable. Whatever 'The Notte' may have been, the hand of the picture-cleaner is here manifest; and those who like bright daylight effect will have it here to their heart's content. Correggio did not, like Rembrandt, in these effects attempt to give the colour of lamplight; the phosphorescent quality of light was more his aim, as in his 'Christ in the Garden.' But here the light on the Virgin and Child is white, chalky, and thin; and the rest of the picture has somewhat the poverty of a copy. The group of shepherds appear, indeed, in character and in the beauty of painting, inferior to the general run of Correggio's figures; the man at the side is even coarse. Still, however, the matchless beauty of the Virgin and Child, the group of angels overhead, the daybreak in the sky, and the whole arrangement of light and shadow, give it the right to be considered, in conception at least, the greatest of his works.

For the conception purpose and originality—as an arrangement of colour, effect, and sentiment—I consider it one of the first works the art of painting has to boast of; and in the adaptation of light and shadow to the illusion of the subject one of the triumphs of modern art."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Tuesday, Dec. 23.

We are on the eve of the New Year, and Paris is looking forward to its six weeks of étrennes and festivities. Innumerable barraques, which in a few days will be gay with toys, comestibles, and cheap articles of Paris, are already being erected on the Boulevards, and the fashionable bon-bon makers are striving to eclipse each other in the variety and eccentricity and elegance of the displays; the bouquetières are busy inventing new combinations of winter flowers; the perfumers are adorning their shop windows with floral extracts, milk of Hebe, and pâte cadémique; the Magasins de Nouveautés are displaying their most gorgeous silks and satins, and the libraries their richly-bound livres de luxe; while the jewellers of the Faubourg St. Germain are brightening up their bijoux du saint siège and the medailles de Londres. But none, perhaps, are so busy as the belles de la grande monde, for the National Assembly has increased Marshal MacMahon's salary from 162,000*fr.* to 300,000*fr.*, and in the course of another week we shall have balls and receptions at the Elysée Palace.

The money was not granted without some little difficulty; and, in order to conciliate the members of the majority, the Duc de Broglie found it requisite to declare that the Government had no wish to weaken the former decisions of the Assembly respecting the maintenance of the seat of Government at Versailles, but simply desired to contribute towards developing the prosperity of Paris. After speeches from MM. Terard and Brisson, who warmly protested against the distrust manifested by the Government towards the Parisians, the Assembly agreed to the increased grant by 427 votes against 136.

The Constitutional Committee of Thirty has held another meeting, but without advancing one step further in its task. Two Royalist deputies declaimed against universal suffrage, and Count de Chambrai proposed the constitution of a Senate, as being indispensable to the proper government of France.

The Committee on the Municipal Law has completed its labours, and has presented its report to the Assembly. It is a terrible indictment against the present municipalities, which it declares "are not always as zealous, intelligent, and energetic as they ought to be." Further, that "it is necessary the authority of the Governments should be uncontested, and that it should be able to rely upon the support of all the functionaries." The result is that the Duc de Broglie will be authorised to appoint as mayors and adjoints individuals who are not members of the local municipal councils. The presentation of the report was followed by an animated debate, in which MM. Brisson and Christophe took part, declaring, truly enough, that the projected bill was a direct attack on the principle of universal suffrage, that it favoured the revival of official candidatures, and, instead of being a measure of peace, was calculated to foment discord in every commune of France. The urgency of the measure was, however, declared by a large majority.

Appropos of the latter, we have had an interesting debate this week respecting an additional credit of £200,000, which M. Keller proposed should be granted to the Minister of War, so as to enable him to call out simultaneously the whole of the contingent for 1874. In the discussion which took place, the Minister, General du Parail, stated that the necessities of the Treasury obliged him to delay calling out the first part of the contingent until March 1, instead of Jan. 1; and not to summon the second portion until July 1. Generals Charrast and Guilleminet and the Duc d'Audiffret Pasquier urged the necessity of making every sacrifice to organise the army in conformity with the law; but, after a protracted debate, the amendment was rejected by the Chamber, greatly to the disgust of the more warlike Parisian organs, who maintain that the army will never be reorganised, and that France will always remain at the mercy of Germany.

The Budget Committee entered yesterday (Monday) upon the discussion of the treaty annulling the sequestration of the Emperor Napoleon's Civil List. The President of the Republic signed a decree on Nov. 12 declaring the treaty valid for execution on Jan. 1, 1874, and a vote of the Assembly would only be necessary for allowing the grant of about 3,000,000*fr.*, which is to be payable in ten yearly instalments.

The Right Centre has elected the Duc d'Audiffret-Pasquier as its President, and M. Batbie and the ex-Minister, M. Boulé, as its Vice-Presidents.

The President of the Republic has received the grand cordon of the Omanié, which was presented to him, together with an autograph letter from the Sultan, by the Turkish Ambassador, on Saturday last. Replying to the address of that Minister, Marshal MacMahon warmly thanked the Sultan for the distinction he had conferred upon him, and said, "In giving me a proof of personal esteem his Majesty has afforded evidence of his friendly sentiments towards France."

The Variétés Theatre has produced a new comedy by M. Victorien Sardou, which is a perfect triumph of millinery and scenic effect, but can lay no claim to dramatic construction or literary merit. It is entitled "Les Merveilleuses," and portrays the aspect of Paris under the Government of the Directory, when the Muscadins, the Merveilleuses, and the Incroyables reigned supreme. The few witty sayings and allusions which the piece contains are derived from a well-known work on the Directory by the brothers Edmond and Jules de Goncourt.

A banquet was given last night, at the Grand Hotel, to Mr. Henry Richard, M.P., by the Society of the Friends of Peace. M. Renouard, the Procurator-General of the Court of Cassation, was in the chair.

The Chamber of Deputies voted the estimates of the Ministry for Public Works last Saturday, and thereupon adjourned until Jan. 20. The Senate has approved the bill relative to the repurchase of the Cavour Canal by the State.

Twelve Cardinals' hats were bestowed on Monday at the Papal Consistory. The new members of the Sacred College included the Nuncios at Paris, Vienna, Lisbon, and Madrid; the Archbishops of Paris, Lisbon, Salzburg, Cambray, and Valencia, and the Primate of Hungary; and two Fathers hitherto unknown to fame, Martinelli, an Augustinian, and Tarquini, a Jesuit.

SPAIN.

A San Sebastian telegram reports the arrival of General Moriones at Ondorroa, in Biscay. His left flank is protected by General Loma.

Rapid advance has been made with the besieging operations against Carthage, and a considerable breach has been effected at the Madrid Gate, in the San Antonio suburb. Last week a powder-magazine in the town exploded, killing eighteen persons and damaging several houses. On the 19th inst. the insurgents made a sally and attacked a reconnoitring detachment. After a three hours' skirmish both parties retreated, the loss on each side being small. In reply to an ultimatum from the commander of the besieging troops, the insurgents have declared that they will resist to the last extremity.

The Government has concluded an agreement by which it will receive an advance of 200,000,000 reals at an interest of 12 per cent per annum. Repayment is to be made in five annual instalments, guaranteed by the revenue derived from the stamp tax.

The newly-elected municipality of Madrid is composed of six Republicans and six Radicals.

Advices from Havannah state that the Cuban debt amounts to 87,000,000 dols.

HOLLAND.

During the discussion of the colonial estimates, a sharp attack was made on the Government with regard to the Acheen expedition; but the estimates were approved by a good majority.

General von Swieten is pressing the Acheenese vigorously. Preparatory to a decisive attack on their stronghold at Kraton he has offered them an opportunity of unconditional surrender.

GERMANY.

The Queen Dowager of Prussia was buried at Berlin on Saturday; but the Emperor was forbidden by his medical advisers to attend. Her Majesty has left all the works of art accumulated by King Frederick William IV., her consort, which constitute a valuable and highly-interesting collection, to her brother-in-law, the present Emperor.

The Civil Marriage Bill was read the second time in the Lower House of the Prussian Diet on Saturday, and the House adjourned until Jan. 12 next.

DENMARK.

The majority of the Folkething have adopted an address to the King, with the object of bringing about a change of Ministry. The King of Denmark has acknowledged receipt of the address, and promised to consult his Ministers.

AMERICA.

The House of Representatives has voted the bill for the reduction of the salaries of Congressmen.

The Attorney-General has decided, on the evidence furnished by Spain, that the Virginian when captured illegally carried the American flag, and that her clearance papers were obtained through perjury.

INDIA.

In connection with the Bengal famine the Secretary of State for India has received from the Viceroy an official statement by telegraph, under date of Calcutta, Dec. 20, according to which the prospects are somewhat less gloomy than seemed to be the case a few weeks ago. In some large districts, however, the yield of rice will only be one third the average crop, and the Lieutenant-Governor estimates that 70,000 tons of grain must be available in the distressed districts before the end of January. It is stated that the demand will be met by the purchases made by the Supreme and the Bengal Government.

The Siamese Embassy arrived at Calcutta on the 22nd inst., to negotiate the frontier questions.

Central Asian news is thus summed up in a telegram from Tashkent of Saturday's date:—The Emir of Cabul is seriously ill; disturbances have broken out in Balkh; and the English Embassy to Yarkund has been received with marked honour. The Times' correspondent at Calcutta states that Mr. Forsyth's mission was welcomed at Yarkund, and permitted freely to inspect the city. The mission was expected to leave for Kashgar on Nov. 16.

An official list has been published of the names of the supposed British subjects captured on board the Virginian. They are twenty-eight in number; the large majority of them were born abroad—most of them in the West Indies.

The court of inquiry into the loss of the Northfleet reports favourably on the precautions taken to ensure the comfort and safety of the emigrants on board. In regard to the paucity of boats, it states that the entire accommodation which could have been provided would have sufficed for only 142 persons out of 379. It suggests that boats might be carried between the main and fore masts, where they would be more accessible. The coast-guard on patrol is admitted to have given the alarm as soon as he made out the signals of distress.

The latest letters from the officers in charge of the Palestine Exploration work are interesting. M. Ganneau, while at Jaffa, discovered the ancient cemetery of the town. On the way to Jerusalem he revisited the site which he had previously identified with the Biblical city of Gezer. Here he traced in part the plan of the old city and the position of its houses and suburbs. Mr. Drake has rejoined the survey party, now at Jericho. The reports received from him and Lieutenant Conder describe the country connected with Samson's exploits and that of David's wanderings.

The Extra Supplement.

THE CHRISTMAS HAMPER.

The gift of a Christmas box is an individual gratification; the sending of a Christmas basket is apt to convey a load of pleasant things for the common enjoyment of an entire household. It is great fun to let the children stand by, "at the opening of this fardel," and to watch their eager curiosity, followed by many a delightful surprise, at the forthcoming of diverse unsuspected articles, for the provision of an abundant family feast. A turkey, or a brace of pheasants, or it may be woodcock, cannot fail to be recognised as the right sort of bird for the dinner-table in these days of genial hospitality, when visitors and friends are expected to join the domestic company; there is much propriety and utility, likewise, in a few pots of such dainty preserved fruits as may serve to flavour a plain pudding; sweetmeats of any and every kind will find sure acceptance in the palate of discerning infancy, reckless of damage to its earlier set of teeth; apples and pears, oranges, almonds, raisins, and walnuts may be stowed in corners of the hamper; and two or three bottles of some cordial liqueur, if happily they have escaped breakage, will be a comfort to the old lady. We, too, may see and taste.

THE VOYAGE TO THE GOLD COAST.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, who left this country by the mail steam-ship Volta, from Liverpool, on Nov. 6, to accompany the military expedition of Sir Garnet Wolseley against the Ashantees, and to furnish illustrations of the war expressly for this Journal, has sent us from Sierra Leone another characteristic and lively sketch of the scenes on board that vessel. The Volta, as we stated before, conveys on this occasion twenty or thirty officers of the Army, and other persons engaged in business connected with the approaching campaign. Three days before their arrival at Sierra Leone there was a great bustle among them on the after-deck, where most of these anxious passengers were occupied in ceaseless examination of their personal luggage. They were exhibiting their kits to each other and comparing the propriety or sufficiency of their equipments for the West African climate and for travelling in the bush that lies between Cape Coast Castle and Comassie. Loud were the complaints of those who had, by some mistake of the tailor or outfitter, come out with suits of clothing thick and warm enough for a Canadian winter. There was one dress, to our Artist's personal knowledge, supplied by a London outfitter, which was stoutly lined and carefully padded with cotton-wool. The gentleman who is seen, at the right-hand corner of our two-page Engraving, seated before a huge open chest filled with an immense variety of articles, was enabled to afford his fellow-passengers a vast deal of amusement. He made them very merry by showing them what a surprising assortment he had got on his departure from the kindness of inexperienced friends at home. As he could not propose to retain them all during the campaign, he allowed a heap of such fancy wares to be sold by auction, which was very good fun. They comprised enough apparatus of the dandy's toilette, and other delicacies or elegant niceties, for several bachelors of the most luxurious habits and fastidious tastes. In the opposite corner is an elderly black lady, returning to her native town of Accra, who sits reading her Bible. When she perceived that our Artist was busy with his pencil she felt a natural desire to appear at no unfair disadvantage in his sketch; so, with a very excusable sensitiveness, on account of her negro features and complexion, she said to him next day that "she hoped, if he put her into a picture for the paper in London, he would not make her like a monkey, but like a human being." We leave the other groups and figures delineated by Mr. Prior to explain themselves, as their lively and truthful representation needs little particular comment. The bunches of tropical fruit, hung from the beam that supports the awning overhead, must be familiar to those who have passed the Azores in a well-provided steam-ship of the great ocean-travelling lines; and many of their experiences on board will be common also to the Peninsular and Oriental Company's passengers in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean. We trust that, long before this date, our Artist and his fellow-voyagers have been safely landed on the Gold Coast.

"Speech day" at Leamington College was observed on Monday, and at the distribution of prizes Lord Leigh presided. He referred to the fact that the late Lord Clarendon and the present Lord Chancellor had presided on former occasions, and expressed a hope that hereafter they might be able to point to future eminent statesmen as having been educated in Leamington College, as Lord Clarendon and the Lord Chancellor had been at Harrow and Winchester.

There was a large gathering of old Marlburians and friends of Marlborough College, on Monday night, at the opening of the Bradleian Hall, erected in memory of the distinguished services to Marlborough of the late Head Master, Dr. Bradley, now Master of University College, Oxford. Dean Stanley presided at the dinner, and among the speakers were the Marquis of Ailesbury, Mr. T. Hughes, M.P., Dr. Butler, Master of Harrow, Mr. Matthew Arnold, and Dr. Farrer. Dr. Bradley, in responding to the toast of his health, said that he knew that, young as that school was, it had already formed an individuality of its own, and greater advance had been made in the highest education during those thirty years of its existence than during the preceding three centuries. Mr. Matthew Arnold (who responded for the visitors) complained that a mere school inspector should be made to speak, with so many dignitaries present, but said the younger part of the audience might at least learn from him, after all that was said of the corrosive effects of disappointed ambition, that it was possible to reach middle life without winning any of the prizes in Church and State, and yet to keep one's good health and good spirits. After the dinner the annual college concert was held.

MUSIC.

Musical, of course, formed part of the proceedings at the Royal Albert Hall on Thursday week, when the foundation-stone was laid of the new training-schools in association therewith. After the ceremonies of the day a conversation and concert took place in the hall. Speeches were made by the Duke of Edinburgh, the Rev. Canon Brookfield (Chaplain in Ordinary to Her Majesty), Dr. Lyon Playfair, and others; and Mendelssohn's music to "Athalia" was performed by full orchestra and the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society—the solos distributed between Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Misses Poyntz, Ferrari, and Sterling. Miscellaneous pieces preceded and followed "Athalia," one of the most effective having been the old English ballad, "The Three Ravens," so well sung by Miss Sterling as to elicit great and general applause and an encore, which was replied to by giving "The Three Fishers." Mr. Barnby conducted, and Dr. Stainer presided at the organ.

An extra recital (the fifth) was given by Dr. Hans von Bulow, at St. James's Hall, last Saturday afternoon, when the great pianist played Mozart's trio in E major, with violin (M. Sauton) and violoncello (M. Lasserre), and, as solos, Bach's organ prelude and fugue in A minor (as transcribed by Liszt), Beethoven's series of variations on an original theme in F (op. 34), and various smaller pieces by Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Liszt, and Chopin. Dr. von Bulow's performances again displayed his remarkable powers in very opposite styles. Some vocal pieces were interspersed by Mlle. Nita Gaetano, who was accompanied by Dr. von Bulow. The room was crowded, and the applause was enthusiastic.

Before the appearance of our next Number another year will have commenced. The chief musical announcements for the close of this year were the performances at the Royal Albert Hall—"The Messiah" on Christmas Eve and concerts in the afternoon and evening of Boxing Day. The earliest musical promises of the coming year are a performance of "The Messiah," at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. Carter, on the evening of New-Year's Day, and the fourth of the new series of London Ballad Concerts, on Jan. 3. The Monday Popular Concerts will re-commence on Jan. 12, with Dr. von Bulow as pianist, the Saturday afternoon performances associated therewith being resumed in the same week; the British Orchestral Society will commence its second season on Jan. 22; and on the following evening the third concert of the Wagner Society and the fifth of the Sacred Harmonic Society will be held. M. Gounod's new series of concerts will begin on Feb. 7, when his music to "Jeanne d'Arc" will be given for the first time in England. The nineteenth season of the concerts of Mr. Henry Leslie's choir will begin on Feb. 19. On Wednesday, March 25, the Philharmonic Society will commence its sixty-second season, the remaining seven concerts being fixed for Monday evenings, April 20, May 4 and 18, June 1, 15, and 29, and July 13. In March it is said that Mr. Carl Rosa's opera company, which has recently been pursuing a successful career in the provinces, will give a short series of performances at Drury Lane Theatre, including the production of an English version of Wagner's "Lohengrin," a work several times promised but not produced by our Italian opera establishments. Of next year's proceedings of these institutions no information will be obtainable for some weeks to come.

THEATRES.

Notwithstanding the pressure of the pantomimes, which exceed in number what we had expected, some of the West-End theatres have found leisure to initiate novelties. Among these the Queen's, on Saturday, produced a new one-act drama by Mr. Charles Reade, which is entitled "Kate Peyton's Lover," and proved successful. The story is already partly known as an episode in a larger work, and consists of but two scenes. The first is the office of a solicitor, one Mr. Houseman, who is consulted by two lovers, Mr. Neville and Mr. Griffith Gaunt, who are rivals for the love of Kate Peyton, and each comes to make his will, and both bequeath to Kate all the property they may possess: in fact, they are on the point of fighting a duel with each other. Kate, from behind a screen, overhears their conversation, and forms her own resolve. Gaunt, having intrusted a letter to a clerk, to be delivered to Miss Peyton in the event of his falling, Kate possesses herself of the precious document and sends the boy for her horse. She rides to the rendezvous, a romantic spot in a northern county, presenting a landscape covered with ice and snow. The duellists meet, with the surgeon, and Gaunt is wounded in the arm, but, still dissatisfied, demands a second shot. Kate interferes, insists upon having their pistols, discharges them in the air, and then wounds. Both lovers bring her water in their hats, and, on her reviving, require her to decide on her choice. While she is contemplating the bullet which has been extracted from Gaunt's arm, the lawyer arrives, informing them that a relative has died, having by his will disinherited Gaunt and left all his property to Kate. There can be no doubt of the issue; she bestows herself and her newly-acquired wealth on the faithful lover who has been wounded in her behalf. Miss Bessie Edwards sustains the part of Kate Peyton, and Mr. Charles Kelly that of Griffith Gaunt. Both play well, and the new drama will doubtless become popular.

An important revival has been produced at the Royalty, not less than O'Keefe's celebrated comedy of "Wild Oats," reduced to three acts. It is well played, and should command a long-run. Mr. Charles Wyndham, as Rover, fully justified the reputation which he has recently gained, and Mr. W. H. Stephens, as Sir George Thunder, was in his element. Mr. J. Clark, as John Dory, was equally so, and, in fact, made a great hit in the part. Miss Henrietta Hodson, as the charming quakeress Lady Amaranth, exceeded herself. Altogether, the revival is a good conception well carried out, and deserves encouragement.

At the Globe a new play has been produced—a version by Mr. Halliday of Charles Dickens's novel, "Dombey and Son," under the title of "Heart's Delight." Mr. Halliday has not attempted to dramatise the whole of the romance, but has selected the episodes of the elopement of Dombey's wife with his clerk and the loves of Toots and Walter Gay for Florence. Mr. H. J. Mortague assumed the parts of both lovers, and in Toots succeeded admirably; and Miss Carlotta Addison as Florence was both graceful and pathetic. Dombey himself was represented by Mr. J. C. Cowper, who also doubled the part of Bunsby with great effect. Miss Helen Barry as Mrs. Dombey was not quite equal to the great situation; but she was ably supported by Mr. Fernandez in Carker. In the matter of Carker's death Mr. Halliday has departed from the text, and makes him commit suicide in the hotel by swallowing poison to escape the vengeance of Dombey. But the great piece of acting in the new drama is Mr. Emery's Captain Cuttle, which is about as true and powerful a representation as was ever realised on the boards. The performance altogether was a remarkable success.

At the Gaiety, the comedy of "John Bull" by the younger Cobden, was revived on Monday, with Mr. Phelps and Mr. Tedde, as Job Thornbury and Dennis Brulgruddery. Both parts were, as might be expected, most elaborately acted. Mr. Vezin, we must also recollect, sustained the part of Peregrine, and was remarkable for the refinement of his style.

PANTOMIMES.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Sydenham establishment led the way in pantomimic production on Saturday; and has certainly presented the public with one of the most gorgeous spectacles ever exhibited. It is first rate in all its departments. The dialogue is from the practised pen of Mr. E. L. Blanchard, the scenery is by Mr. F. Fenton, and the action is aided by the talents of Mr. George Conquest and his son, Miss Caroline Parkes, Mlle. Le Brun, and Miss Annie Thirlwall. The subject is the ever popular "Puss in Boots," with the additions; "or, Dame Trot and her Comical Cat, and the Ogre, Fee-Fo-Fum," which the fertile author has adorned with the graces of his wit and the brilliant hues of his fancy. The characters are numerous, and the business of the most varied description. Among the best scenes are the mill and country landscape in Normandy, the Witch's Glen in the Catskill Mountains, and the Ogre's Castle, with its enchanted chamber, in which Mr. Conquest performs his hanky-panky tricks, and assumes various shapes, dilating into gigantic proportions, or shrinking into those of the dwarf, and even the mouse, in which latter form he is pounced on by Puss, and his fate determined. In the course of the action there are several pretty songs and duets, and one in particular which introduces the transformation scene, one of Mr. Charles Brew's wonderful contrivances. Nor is the Harlequinade less worthy of commendation, consisting of scenes every one of which excites the most uproarious laughter. Mr. Charles Ash is the Harlequin, Mlle. Le Brun Columbine, Mr. J. Beekingham Pantaloon, and the Great Little Rowella Clown. The work is produced on the great stage in the centre transept, and the auditorium is crowded with multitudes of spectators, themselves presenting a spectacle scarcely to be rivalled by the most costly arrangements of the boards. It is certainly altogether a very grand sight, and ought to be witnessed by every family in England during the holidays.

DRURY LANE.

The pantomime at the great national theatre is also, as usual, from the pen of Mr. E. L. Blanchard. It is his twenty-fifth annual at this house, and is entitled "Jack in the Box; or, Harlequin Little Tom Tucker and the Three Men of Gotham who went to Sea in a Bowl." The place called Gotham is situated near Nottingham; and here the drama presents the villagers busy in building the Bowl which is to serve as the ark to which the stupid natives most idly intrust their safety; for eventually it is wrecked on the Black Rocks, though by fairy aid the voyagers escape destruction, finding the Golden Land of Plenty, where they arrive in time to witness the Harvest Home of the Fairies. On the illustration of this idea Mr. William Beverly has exhausted the riches of his imagination in a series of scenes which are calculated to delight the most fastidious. In a previous scene much ingenuity is displayed touching a fancy fair held on Midsummer Eve every century. Imagine Felix, the Prince of the Fortunate Isles, awaiting the hour of midnight on Gotham-common, when, to his surprise, a number of mushrooms transform themselves into so many fancy stalls presided over by the fairies! One of these presents him with the talisman he wanted—namely, Jack-in-the-Box—by means of which he has to cure of her idiotic conceit Princess Poppet, the beautiful but silly daughter of Cockalorum the Great, King of Cockaigne. In these few words we have, we think, sufficiently told the whole story, which is admirably acted by no less artists than Miss Harriet Coveney, Miss Alma Murray, and Mr. Brittain Wright. The Harlequinade includes Messrs. Fred Evans and W. H. Harvey as Clowns, Will Simpson and Willie Harvey as Harlequins, Paul Herring and J. Morris as Pantaloons, and the Misses L. Grosvenor and S. Harvey as Columbines; to whom we may add Miss Amy Rosalind as Harlequin à la Watteau. The ballets by Mr. W. C. Levey, and the general action as arranged by Mr. John Cormack, particularly the children's scenes, are, as usual, ingenious and most effective. The manager has personally superintended the getting up, and been exceedingly liberal in his outlay, bestowing the utmost expenditure on the appointments and accessories, so as to secure their efficiency.

COVENT GARDEN.

"Bo-Peep and Red Riding Hood" is the title of the pantomime produced by Mr. Rice, with the assistance of Julian Hicks for the scenery, which is magnificent. Here little Red Riding-Hood is in danger from the intrigues of the Fox and the Wolf; the former, as the price of his own safety, having contracted to lead the interesting heroine into the power of the latter. Disguised as a doctor, he visits the Dame's cottage, and persuades the child to visit the Glowworm Glen. She leaves, in consequence, her sister, Bo-Peep, to fill the rôle of Queen of May in the village festivities in which she was prepared to share. Bo-Peep leads her sheep into the fields, that they may be no trouble to her in the performance of her appointed duties. The festivities, however, are doomed to interruption, for the Fox steals a Goose; an accident which provokes a chase and a combat. The Glowworm Glen is a remarkable scene, revealing a mountain gorge, which affords space for a picturesque torrent, and fairies disporting themselves in its vicinity. Anon, Bo-Peep's sheep are seen wandering down the rocks, pursued by the Fox, who is maliciously driving them where they may gorge the Dragon; first of all cutting off their tails, to show the Wolf that he had executed his commission. The delay is fatal to himself, for the Dragon awakes, and devours him; and almost does the same for Bo-Peep, who has followed the footprints of her flock, but who is rescued by the timely interference of Red Riding-Hood. The heroine is, however, herself in danger, for she is seized by the Wolf; but her brother Marmion attacks the beast, and wounds him. Marmion thus brings himself under the law that whoever spills blood within the lily's home must perish; and Marmion accordingly dies in the arms of the Flowrets. The rest of the action follows the legend, for the Wolf devours Red Riding-Hood, whose death, however, is avenged, and all is made right again by the Transformation scene, where we are permitted to behold in their happy abodes the good and virtuous brother and sister, thus terminating the spectacle with a serious moral.

PRINCESS'S.

At this theatre the subject of the pantomime is the same as that at the Crystal Palace. It is entitled "Little Puss in Boots; or, Harlequin the Ogre and the Miller's Son." The treatment is very different in the two versions of the same tale. The action commences with a cat parliament, engaged in legislating for the redress of the wrongs of the feline race. In the course of it a cat guides a miller's son to wealth and fame. Jocosco, as the Marquis Carabas, falls in love with the Princess Opaline; and ultimately Puss and Jocosco, helped by a cat army led by the Fairy Minette, vanquish the Ogre, who is the enemy of all goodness, and wins the favour of King Kokahoops, who shortly afterwards arrives on the scene. The whole ends with a brilliant transformation.

STANDARD.

The pantomime at this theatre is distinguished by several points of novelty, and is entitled "Whittington and his Cat," a subject which Mr. J. Douglass has treated in a very original manner. Dick, flying from his persecutors, is seen near the traditional stone, where the spectator may re-acquaint himself with the well-known features of Highgate-hill and the celebrated view of London from its summit. The bells of the churches bid the runaway 'prentice return to his cruel master. He does so, and reappears in the soap-merchant's kitchen, where he is learning the mystery of cooking. Fitzwarren summons all his servants and wishes them to send something on board his ship, the Pretty Polly, the profit of each venture to belong to the sender. Everyone makes his offer. Dick, having nothing else to send, agrees, at Puss's instigation, to send his cat, or rather to sail himself, with Puss, to try his luck abroad. A storm overtakes the vessel, she is wrecked, but, by the intervention of the Fairy Fairweather, Dick, the cat, captain, and crew are landed safely at Morocco. At the palace of the Dey of Morocco a grand procession of Eastern warriors takes place. The arrival of strangers is announced. A banquet is prepared, when the visitors are overwhelmed with rats and mice. Puss soon clears them. The monarch offers fabulous sums to buy the clever cat, eventually a bargain is decided upon, and Dick sets sail for home, loaded with riches. A grand double moving panorama is here introduced—the procession of the Lord Mayor's show; its progress through the Strand, Fleet-street, Old St. Dunstan's Church, Old St. Paul's, and arrival at the Guildhall, decorated for the reception of the Lord Mayor, Richard Whittington, destined to hold that office three times in succession. The King, hearing of the fame and sudden rise of Whittington, orders a grand pageant and warlike celebration in his honour. The emblems of Peace, Industry, and War (Messdames Neville, S. Brereton, and Mr. G. Hamilton) are summoned, and the last-named chosen. The spectators are now introduced to the armoury in Guildhall, and thence transported to Cannock Chase, in Henry IV.'s time. The whole of the troops assembled, a warlike parade takes place, the manoeuvres terminating with a costly, magnificent pageant. The festival of Fame succeeds, displaying brilliant costumes, armour, and appointments. We have next the interior of the Mansion House, occupied by the interview of the King (Miss Fielding) and the marriage of Dick Whittington to Alice Fitzwarren. The grand Transformation scene represents a rapid descent from sky to sea, concluding with a gorgeous and imposing tableau. Harlequins, Mr. Fred Payne and Mr. J. Talbot; Pantaloon, Mr. Tully Louis; Columbines, Mesdames Esta and Celling; Clown, Mr. Harry Payne; Policeman, Mr. Ghent. The scenery has been painted by and under the direction of Mr. Richard Douglass, assisted by Mr. J. Neville, Mr. Gooderan, and assistants. The costumes and armour are designed and executed by M. Gustave Lafayette (costumier to the Parisian theatres). The music is arranged by Mr. W. Corri. It is obvious that the materials associated with the incidents will much conduce to the success of this costly pantomime.

SURREY.

This transpentine theatre is now under the management of Mr. W. Holland, who has opened it under the improved principles of the present time, relieving the visitor from excessive charges for playbill or the necessity of a docteur to the box-keeper. Mr. Frank W. Green has supplied the pantomime, which is called "Jack and the Beanstalk," but deals also with the fortunes of Margery Daw and the pranks of the Man in the Moon. These different fables thus amalgamated are well enough known to the general public. Much of the action and dialogue, however, has a practical value. For instance, the introductory portion takes us to the Den of the Demon Butcher, where the Evil Spirits are shown conspiring against the poor man by keeping up prices and threatening to deprive him of his beer; but the fairy Benevolencia disperses the troop and suggests the performance of a pantomime. A widow's house and dairy and a view of Sir Roger de Coverley's mansion follow, and we are introduced to Sir Roger, Margery, and Jack, who sells his cow in the usual fashion, but is favoured by the Good Fairy, at whose instance the Beanstalk makes its appearance. Jack climbs to the moon, is kindly received by the Man there, and finds his way to Fairyland and a Cage of Love-Birds, which perform for him a grand ballet of Love-Bird Fairies, one of Mr. J. Milano's excellent arrangements. In his travels Jack meets with various adventures. He visits Giant Grumble Grim in his home, falls into danger, but escapes. The next scene is the Home of Margery Daw, to which the Man in the Moon, as the Scotch say, condescends; and after that the Baronial Hall in the castle of the ancient Barons de Coverley, which changes to Margery Daw's Cottage. We cannot pretend to relate the story of courtship, jealousy, excitement, terror, reaction, and storming of the Castle of Malignant Spirits, and how the lovers are made happy in Cloudland. The Transformation scene is occupied with the Silver Cascade on the Lake of the Lily-Bell Fairies, in the Land of Cloudless Skies. The Harlequinade employs a double troupe of pantomimists. There are a special Clown, engaged expressly to play one comic scene, Harry Boleno; and the Surrey Clown, Harry Hemmings. George Vokes is Harlequin, and Miss J. Elliott Harlequin Watteau. Wilson Parker is Pantaloon, Les Petit Rousalis are Sprites, and the Misses Elliott and Miss Hemmings are the three Columbines. The composition is eminently qualified to become popular with the neighbourhood.

EAST LONDON.

Here the pantomime, written by Mr. Osman, partakes of the character of an extravaganza, and is entitled "Le Faust and Marguerite; or, Mephistophiles and the Pretty Fairy under the Sea." Miss Limmer plays Faust, and Miss Seaman Mephistophiles. Marguerite, as seen in a vision, is represented by Miss Seaford. But Faust has a rival in Siebel (young Tom Sayers), and in the end a combat takes place between them. Further we cannot continue the fable. The Harlequinade includes John Ward as Clown, Mr. Collin as Pantaloon, Willie Warde as Harlequin, Phoebe Laurie as Columbine, and R. Ross as a policeman.

At Sadler's Wells the subject and title of the pantomime are "The Babes in the Wood"; at the Grecian, "Harlequin the Wood Demon, the Giant, the Fish, the Pear, and the Tree; or, Pretty Pauvrete and the Mammoth's Three," written by Mr. G. Conquest and Mr. H. Spry; at the Britannia, "Cocorico; or, The Hen with the Golden Eggs"; at the Pavilion, "Harlequin Puss in Boots; or, Mother Hubbard and her Comical Dog"; at the New Albion, "Harlequin Aladdin and the Lamp; or, The Wizard, the Ring, and the Scamp"; at the Royal Alexandra, "Mother Red Cap"; at Sanger's (late Astley's), "Cinderella"; at the Victoria, "Harlequin King of Trumps"; at the Marylebone, "The Man in the Moon"; and at the Elephant and Castle, "Harlequin Babes of the Wood, Columbine Queen of the Sea, and the Lady of the Land."

NEW BOOKS.

The island archipelagos of Australasia have lately been regarded with more interest, since the murder of Bishop Coleridge Patteson, and the trial of several Englishmen, in New South Wales or Queensland, for the crime of kidnapping Polynesian labourers to work in the sugar plantations; and the savage slaughter which has taken place in the Fiji Islands has drawn further attention to this part of the world. A bulky and handsome volume, with many beautiful illustrations, is composed of the Jottings of the Cruise of H. M. S. Curacoa among the South Sea Islands in 1865 (Longmans). The author is the late Mr. Julius Brechley, F.R.G.S., of Maidstone, who spent eighteen years of his life, from 1849 to 1867, in his extensive and adventurous travels through North and South America, China and Japan, Mongolia and Siberia, Australia, New Zealand, and Polynesia, making valuable collections, and gathering much fresh knowledge upon the natural features and human inhabitants of those vast regions. In June, 1865, he accompanied Admiral Sir William Wiseman, in the steam-frigate Curacoa, in a sea-going tour of three months to display the British flag in the Western Pacific, visiting the Samoa or Navigator Islands, the Friendly Islands, the Fiji or Viti Islands, the New Hebrides, Banks's Islands, Santa Cruz, part of the Solomon Islands, the Loyalty Islands, and New Caledonia, and thence returning to Sydney. Two officers of the Curacoa, whose company he enjoyed on this occasion, were Lieutenant the Hon. Herbert Meade (now deceased) and Lieutenant Foljambe, both of whom are known as the writers of interesting narratives of their experiences in New Zealand and Australasia. Mr. Brechley's account, however, of the state of these island groups, and of the natives, as they were eight years ago, has not been anticipated by any other publication; and it will be found very instructive. Norfolk Island was also taken by the way, and there Mr. Brechley met the late Bishop of Melanesia, who was destined to fall a victim, in September, 1871, to the misdirected but sorely provoked anger of the natives of Nukapu, near Santa Cruz, on account of the cruelties committed by some European ruffians in the illegal slave trade. Mr. Brechley's opinion concerning the results of the Christian missions, as hitherto carried on by some of the agencies employed, was not altogether so favourable as might be desired. He considered that they were too apt to rely exclusively upon dogmatic theological instruction, and to estimate their success by the number of professed converts and communicants. Nevertheless, he found that they were doing much good, though not unmixed with the inconvenience of exciting local dissensions, and of disturbing social relations which had previously exerted a salutary restraint over the people. He at the same time denounced with just severity the infamous conduct of lawless English, American, or colonial adventurers in those seas, and demanded strict measures of repression against them.

We may continue, therefore, our study of the facts relating to this question, with a perusal of the new book by Commander Albert Hastings Markham, R.N., The Cruise of the Rosario among the New Hebrides and Santa Cruz Islands (Sampson Low, Marston, and Searle). The Rosario, one of her Majesty's sloops of war, commissioned at Sydney, in October, 1871, by Commander Markham, was employed, immediately after the death of Bishop Patteson, expressly to visit the islands and to collect the evidence of missionaries, planters, and other persons, with reference to the "labour traffic" and the alleged kidnapping of the natives. In this service the author was engaged till the end of January; and, from his responsible position as a British naval officer intrusted with so grave a mission, we must attach the greatest weight to his testimony, and likewise to his individual judgment upon all the questions herein involved. He supplies but too abundant evidence of the reality of these "horrible atrocities," which have been frequently exposed, yet which have not been effectually punished or checked. The single case of the brig Carl, of Melbourne, and its man-stealing voyage to the New Hebrides, in 1871, for the purpose of obtaining forced labourers to sell to the Fiji sugar-planters, is enough to disgrace the British Australian name, both in its imperial and its colonial quality, for many years to come, especially as Dr. James Patrick Murray, and his accomplices in the inhuman butchery perpetrated on board that vessel, were finally allowed, when the case was tried at Sydney, to escape the just penalty of their crimes. We believe, indeed, that the main guilt of this most nefarious system lies with a portion of the white sugar-planting settlers in the Fiji Islands, who are there beyond the legal jurisdiction of their own Government. It appears to us that the summary annexation of those islands to the British Empire, not as an appendage to Queensland or New South Wales, but as a Crown colony, is the proper step to be taken, after all, for the prevention of the slave trade; and without this, it is to be feared, the recent Act of Parliament, authorising stringent prosecutions and penalties, will scarcely put a stop to the mischief. The general prevalence of a violent animosity in the island population against the white race of their ruthless oppressors is not to be wondered at; but it broke out in more than one assault upon landing parties even of the Rosario's crew, and Commander Markham was obliged to chastise the hostile natives of Nguna, of Nukapu, and of Aurora Island, by the usual method of burning their villages and destroying their canoes. At Nukapu there was a little fighting, but without loss of life on either side. We are glad to observe that Commander Markham is able, though Mr. Brechley could not, to give a very favourable report of the results of missionary effort, more especially of that promoted by the Scottish Reformed Presbyterian Church in the New Hebrides. Its book is furnished with an excellent map and with several wood engravings.

We return again to Mr. Brechley's Cruise of the Curacoa, for the sake of that portion of its contents which relates to the natural history of the different groups of islands visited by him in 1865, and which has a scientific interest of its own, apart from the painful topic of the Polynesian slave trade. Nearly half the volume consists of the series of fifty exquisitely drawn and coloured plates, with learned and accurate descriptive notes, representing Mr. Brechley's collections of the birds, the reptiles, the fishes, the shells, and the insects, which are arranged and commented upon, respectively, the first mentioned by Dr. G. R. Gray, the others by Dr. Albert Gunther, both of the British Museum, and of the highest authority upon each subject. Two fine chromolithographs and nearly a hundred engravings, with a good map or chart of the South-West Pacific Ocean, complete the apparatus of illustration, adding to the use and beauty of the author's posthumous work.

There is a strong inclination to couple together Lady Bell: by the author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline," and Against the Stream: by the author of "The Schonberg-Cotta Family," because in each case there are three volumes, published by Messrs. Strahan and Co.; in each case the writer is, confessedly or presumably, of the softer sex; and in each case—the former being called "a story of last century," and the latter "the story of an heroic age in England"—it is clear that readers, in the great majority of instances, will have to put their minds through a retrograde movement, and separate themselves, as much as possible, from associations peculiar to their own generation. In other respects the two stories are as dissimilar as chalk and cheese; the former, one would say, is a clever exercise in the preterite, an ingenious attempt to resuscitate the past by the witchcraft of imagination, not without the help of historical and traditional lore, and the latter, one would say, is, so far as dates and important incidents are concerned, a piece of genuine reminiscence, and, so far as minor incidents, descriptions of character, analysis of motives, moral reflections, and religious sentiments or convictions or suggestions are concerned, a faithful reflex of a life as it really was, or, at any rate, seems, through a long vista of years, to have been, and a minutely-elaborated impression, upon paper, of an inner self, as it undoubtedly now is and as it is honestly believed to have been before it was moulded and coloured in the course of a long life. Of the two stories neither can be conscientiously recommended to those who are in search of sheer amusement; but it can be confidently affirmed that the former is more likely to "suit their book," as the saying is, than the latter, which, such is its sermonising character, will prove a great stumbling-block to the light-minded and the frivolous. The former is admirably adapted for the gratification of such readers as, caring comparatively little about the effect produced upon themselves by a tale and the characters introduced into it, are content to lose themselves in contemplation of the author's cleverness, and, whilst never for a moment being deluded into forgetting that what they have passing before them is a mere imitation of bygone life, to acknowledge that it is very like what they have always heard and read about the subject, and to nod approval and recognition where such scenes and such characters as tradition ascribes to the time when George the Third was King are duly and at measured intervals presented to them in a series of pages, not too closely crowded with their excellent English, having sufficiently numerous peculiarities of diction to mark the epoch. The latter will afford delight to persons who are not averse from moral anatomy, carried even to the extent of infinitesimal dissection, when the process is conducted, as it certainly is in the present instance, with masterly skill, and is accompanied, as it certainly is in the present instance, with an improving lecture and with interesting illustrations, and who can tolerate garrulity, diffuseness, and an appearance of self-consciousness, when, as may certainly be asserted in the present instance, there is at the bottom of it all a fund of wisdom and sound advice leavened with the heaven of noble sentiment, alleviated by a dash of quiet humour, and obviously intended as a kindly offering from a Christian who loves all neighbours. "Lady Bell" is a story showing how it might have fared in the last century with a penniless orphan, daughter and only child of a ruined earl; and "Against the Stream" is a story, partly of a stepmother and partly of the first abolition of slavery, and its tide is derived to some extent, perhaps, from a consideration of the direction in which both stepmothers and abolitionists generally have to or are disposed to pull, and certainly from the fact that the earliest abolitionists refused "to drift smoothly along with the evil current of the times." Both stories are admirable in their own way; but it would be almost impossible to estimate too highly the something more than wholesome tone for which "Against the Stream" is remarkable.

No knowledge of the Russian language is, fortunately, required for a hearty, if not an adequate, appreciation of the merits conspicuous in Russian Folk-Tales, by W. R. S. Ralston, M.A., &c. (Smith, Elder, and Co.). It bears upon the face of it sufficient evidence that no little learning, research, and, as a necessary consequence, time, together with a noticeably happy style of writing English, have been freely put at the service of the public for the purpose of shedding light upon a subject which can never fail to be of interest so long as children will be fascinated by tales of the marvellous, the grotesque, and the impossible; so long as parents will pay attention to that which fascinates their children; so long as any smoke still ascends through the atmosphere of life and testifies to a fire of superstition smouldering amongst the bulk of a people; and so long as—should the fire of superstition be completely put out by the particularly cold water of science and reason—the philosopher, the historian, and the antiquarian are left to trace back to their source the many ramifications of various nationalities, and to show, by the method of comparison, how much humanity there is in human nature, how the different families of men, whatever contrasts of colour may be assumed by them and their works under the influence of circumstances, have, mentally and morally, some fundamental similarity, or borrow one from another. The subject, in fact, is that of popular tales; and, in the present instance, fifty-one of such tales, coloured Russian, but literally translated into English, are presented for the information, gratification, and, if such a feeling still exist amongst a generation spoiled by the incessant benefactions of intelligent authors, the gratitude of English readers. To some of the stories parallels, derived from other foreign collections, are appended in a brief form; and, when it is mentioned that the time-honoured name of Bluebeard appears, and that legends current in the Highlands of Scotland are frequently alluded to, by way of illustration, it will be seen that, though the author takes us into the heart of Russia, he is careful, as often as possible, to keep up our remembrance of places nearer home. It cannot be said that the stories are of themselves particularly entertaining and calculated for consecutive reading; indeed, two or three are about as many as ordinary stomachs will be able to bear at one time: to be fully enjoyed they must be regarded as a study rather than as a means of amusement—that is to say, by adults who have outgrown the taste for demons, ghouls, ghosts, and vampires; other persons, and especially children with unsophisticated minds, big swallows, and sanguinary appetites, may generally indulge their credulity, revel in magic and witchcraft, and sup their fill of horrors.

Many a really great man's life would yield far less attractive materials for making a readable book than those which have been used for compiling the contents of the two volumes entitled Henry Fothergill Chorley: Autobiography, Memoir, and Letters, compiled by Henry G. Hewlett (Richard Bentley and Son). The subject of the autobiography and memoir appears to have been from his youth up an eccentricity or an original, if the terms be not almost synonymous; to have had a great deal of the human porcupine about him; to have been self-conscious and irritable to an unusual degree; to have been for the most part unsuccessful as an author, but so successful as a critic, and chiefly a musical critic, as to have become a general terror, and to have very early in his career attained such a reputation in his critical capacity that any particularly scathing article that appeared in the Athenaeum was pretty sure, rightly or wrongly, and very often the latter, to be ascribed to him. He was, it seems, strictly conscientious and perfectly incorruptible; and, that being so, what will strike those who know anything about such matters as the most remarkable achievement that he, an unsuccessful author be it remembered, accomplished will most likely be that he should have died not only without leaving a wife and family in penury but with considerable property to will away. Lest this fact should raise hopes as well as excite astonishment, let it be at once recorded that he was never married and that he inherited money. The account he gives of his very first years—belonging, as he did, to a family of Quakers, who were at heart no Quakers, and who were all cast in a singular mould—is very interesting and even pathetic; and the story of his after-life is glorified by the splendour reflected from the names of illustrious or notorious persons with whom he was more or less intimately acquainted and from the society in which he occasionally moved, and is extremely amusing as a proof of the way in which human vanity, sensitiveness, ambition, and disinclination to play the part of that patient merit which has to bide its time, will enable one solitary man, if he have an influential journal to write in, to wield a power totally disproportionate, one would say, to his critical abilities, and, in a great measure, merely illusory. Nor can one help fancying that the critic's judgment, for all his conscientiousness and integrity, must have been, if not biased, at any rate modified in expression, by reason of the great inclination he showed for a certain sort of social circle, in which, of course, he made most of his friendships; and that a critic, who, after all, is human and cannot be proof against human weakness altogether, is the more likely to keep himself impartial the more he abstains from intimate connection with those who are sure to come under his critical observation; the more, in fact, he abstains from mixing himself up with cliques and seeking his recreation and his friends amongst those who will supply him with his daily work and bid fair to become his bitter enemies; the more, in other words, he throws off the professional and seeks society which does not "smell of the shop." It will startle some good folk, who have been in the habit of imagining that the banker-poet Rogers was the pink of amiability, courtesy, and benevolence, to find him appearing, in the volumes under consideration, as ruder and surlier to a struggling young man than no matter what old bear with no matter how sore a head.

It is certainly surprising that Tiber, father Tiber, though the Romans no longer pray to him and have given over the navigation of his sacred stream to an enterprising Englishman, should not long ago have had his course explored in its entirety and subsequently described in the language of England or of Italy, or of both; but that he has not is asserted on excellent authority, and has led to the publication of a fine volume, much to be desired, entitled The Pilgrimage of the Tiber, by William Davies (Sampson Low and Co.). The illustrations, which are more than a few, have charms of their own, independent of the subject; and the author of the letterpress is as agreeable and well-informed a guide and companion as anybody need wish to have in either a real or an imaginary trip from the Mediterranean to Mount Fumajolo or a neighbouring spot where "a copious little stream" bubbles up from the green sod, and a native, pointing to it with his staff, exclaims, "Questo si chiama il Tevere a Roma." Some tastes would, perhaps, have been better suited if the author could have refrained from halting at certain spots to repeat hackneyed old bits of Roman history and to quote hackneyed old pieces from the Roman poets; but to have abstained would have been superhuman, and the author is so conscious of his own humanity that he forewarns the reader of what will happen, and offers a sort of defence. But in the eighth chapter he makes handsome amends for any human weakness that he may, in somebody's opinion, have exhibited; it is only to be regretted that he had not more to say about "popular songs of the Tiberine district," and more specimens to adduce; they will, undoubtedly, be quite new to the majority of his readers, and as interesting as they are new. Good rather than harm would have resulted, one would say, if the author had, at the eleventh hour, struck out the concluding effusion, which he calls "L'Addio;" for everything that it contains, as regards the sloping of the day, the sombre grey of the landscape, the lowing of the oxen, the mechanic's practice of leaving work, the birds' habit of retiring to rest, and the tendency of rivers, old as they may be, to flow on for ever, "through sunlight and starlight" (and, he might have added, pitch-darkness), has often been previously remarked by observers of nature, is not handled by him in any particularly novel fashion, and cannot be said to have much more to do with his subject than with any other.

The differences between the English or Scottish character in this island of Great Britain, and that of our fellow countrymen and women settled in the Southern hemisphere, cannot as yet be very conspicuous. But there is a certain freshness in the incidents of Australian social and domestic life, when cleverly and truthfully depicted by a Melbourne novelist with such powers of conception and expression as are shown by Mr. James D. Hay in Mysie's Pardon (W. Blackwood, Edinburgh). These three interesting volumes of a highly original story are reprinted from a Melbourne periodical, in which they had won the high approval of some thousands of colonial readers, so that the author is not likely to have erred in the way of unfavourable representation. But he can still less be accused of flattering the prevalent notions and habits of society in the gold-scrambling districts and towns of Victoria and some parts of New Zealand. The structure of his story is compact enough as regards the plot, which turns upon the harsh and obstinate refusal of a middle-aged Scotch spinster, Mysie Raeburn, to look kindly upon her youthful half-sister, Maggie, who has been fetched as an orphan from Scotland to share her brother's home at his thriving farm near Ballarat. There is a very natural but violent feminine quarrel. When Maggie, in the second volume, becomes the wife of George Garden, she only wants Mysie's pardon to make her happiness complete. The chain of events which at last brings on this desirable change of temper is linked with a neatly contrived underplot of fraud and forgery, perpetrated by one Nettlewood at the expense of Garden and his partners, and with the necessity for a voyage to New Zealand in pursuit of the criminal, leading to a false alarm for Maggie's life. This introduces a good description of the town of Dunedin, in Otago, and of the Hokitika gold diggings on the west coast of New Zealand, added to that which places before us the scenery near Ballarat and on the shores of Port Phillip. Mr. Hay is endowed with a genuine vein of quiet humour. The character of Mysie, a true Scotchwoman and an imperious housewife, but honest, faithful, and brave, is very well portrayed; so are most of the other characters; and that of good old Joe Dodder, the humble-minded clerk, might have figured in one of Dickens's stories without discredit to its author.

Another story of life in our Southern colonies, which is also worth reading for the knowledge it gives of their real condition and for its vivid pictures of scenery, is The Tasmanian Lily, by Mr. James Bonwick (H. S. King and Co.). The author has written several instructive essays or notices of colonial history, one of which attracted some attention by its account of the total extermination of the native race in Tasmania, formerly called Van Diemen's Land. In this short tale, or rather series of sketches and dialogues, he gradually makes the newly-arrived family of Captain Douglas acquainted, by the help of their friend Mr. Roberts, and others long resident there, with a variety of local circumstances and ways of existence. The topography and natural history, the geology botany, and zoology of the island are minutely discussed. We scarcely know any other book on Tasmania from which so much information is to be gained, and we have already formed a good opinion of that colony. It is very suitable for the settlement of sober middle-class English families, with a moderate capital, who want a comfortable home to bring up their children in a peaceful and orderly course of rural industry. It is, perhaps, not the place to make a rapid fortune; and so much the better, in one point of view, for that class of people. To such emigrants we should certainly recommend either Tasmania or the Middle Island of New Zealand (where there are not many more of the Maories than of gypsies in Great Britain) in preference to any part of the Australian Continent. The climate is far more congenial, healthy, and refreshing. The scenery and natural productions of the country are beyond comparison more interesting. The rewards of prudent industry, though smaller, are safer and surer than in the lands of gold-mining and speculating in deceitful mining shares. What is even more important, unless the virtues of English domestic life have utterly died out in this age of greedy and paltry ambitions, there is in Tasmania an absence of that odious fast and sharp tone of society, which is the curse of newly rich countries, and from which both America and Australia have to dread the most serious evils in their future phases of "progress."

In the great intellectual feast which is always going on nowadays, from one year's end to another, a place amongst the side-dishes, elegant in appearance, more or less rare in material, and more or less delicate, although piquant in flavour, must be assigned to such works as The Troubadours, by John Ruthvenford (Smith, Elder, and Co.). The subject is one which has some historical, more literary, and most social, interest. The author in his treatment of it has confined himself almost entirely to the twelfth century, because up to that time they had but a misty, intangible existence, and after that time met with speedy extinction. He commences with a brief historical sketch of the country which was the native home of the troubadours; he then proceeds to discourse at greater length about Provençal poetry, courts of love, love in theory, love as practised by the cavalier servente and his mistress, wandering troubadours, and the influence of the troubadours; and, in an appendix, he gives the thirty-one articles (if that were the whole number) contained in the "code of love." He seems to have spared no pains, to have gone to many and the best sources of information, and to have translated into English—for it is presumed that the translations are his own—very many lyrics of the old troubadours with almost invariable ease, freedom, and spirit, and frequently with appropriate quaintness and striking grace, although an occasional phrase of modern slang, such as "shut up!" and "get out!" and such a vulgarity as "his'n" will offend a reader expectant of the antique, and, above all, of the gentil. Indeed, one would say that the author had every requisite for his task, except a sympathetic spirit: the practical demon, with a sardonic sneer for excessive sentiment and a tendency to broaden playfulness into burlesque, displays a little of the cloven hoof. His volume, nevertheless, will be quite a mine of information and a storehouse of delight for whoever is curious about the troubadours.

A very pretty and readable trifle, very neatly, pleasantly, and at the end pathetically, treated by an anonymous author is A Ship in the Fens (Macmillan and Co.). It is quite astonishing to me how much should have been made, by perfectly legitimate means, of so little, and so deep an interest should be created, without any pretence or apparent effort, by a narrative so slight and so straightforward; but marvels may be wrought by one touch of nature, by photographic fidelity of reproduction, by a persuasive style of writing. The author, too, one may venture to say, has, to some extent, broken new ground; for the fenny country of Upware and other places in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, at a distance of from eleven to sixteen or twenty miles, has not been overworked, to say the least of it, by writers of fiction or fictitious or quasi-fictitious love-stories. And yet young Cantabs do, as the author seems to be fully aware, go in quest of adventure to that fenny district and find beauty lurking in poverty amongst the marshes and mists and carry on flirtations which do not always end so unobjectionably, if quite as sadly, as the flirtation so charmingly described by our author. Our author, moreover, has shown that the aforesaid fenny district has peculiar features, as regards both the natural scenery and the inhabitants, which are, no doubt, unsuspected by all but the initiated, and which, when they are so touchingly and happily hit off as they are in the little book under consideration, deserve attentive examination. Let not anybody take up the little book with an expectation of anything heroic or startling; the story is a very quiet one, but very much to be commended.

Many, if not most, persons share the love of adventure which is attributed to the gentleman to whom Camp Notes, by Frederick Poyle (Chapman and Hall) is dedicated; and to them, therefore, the book may with equal reason be expected to afford entertainment. The adventures—which, by-the-way, are not represented as having been invariably encountered, or even participated in or witnessed, by the author in person—are more or less connected with incidents of sport pursued in Asia, Africa, and America. They are, for the most part, highly exciting; they are recorded with great zest and animation; and they are, when occasion serves, rendered less ghastly and more amusing than they would otherwise be by the quaint jargon, garnished with queer and laughable American oaths and phrases, in which the stories are told. Hunters, rangers, rowdies, greasers alias creoles, filibusters, and amongst them General Walker; quasi-filibusters, and amongst them, if it be permissible to include him in so questionable a category, the distinguished Rajah Brooke; and savages beautiful or hideous, are the personages with whom the reader will make acquaintance; and the tales that are narrated, and often very well and powerfully narrated, are quite in character with such personages, sometimes marvellous, sometimes sanguinary, sometimes melodramatic, sometimes suggestive of the long-bow, sometimes historically interesting, sometimes simply ludicrous.

A number of more or less admirable illustrations, varying in style from the stately to the grotesque, from the delicacy of high art to the powerful but rough expression of caricature, should alone be sufficient to make a market for the handsome volume entitled The Harz Mountains, by Henry Blackburn (Sampson Low and Co.). The pen-and-ink sketches, it is announced, are by Mr. R. Caldecott; but, in another sense, the pen-and-ink sketches—meaning the text—are, of course, by Mr. Blackburn, who, however, appears likewise in the character of a draughtsman. Mr. H. Hierkomer also contributes a specimen of his artistic skill. The reader will learn from the book something about Hanover, something about Goslar, something about Harzburg, something about the Brücken, something about Wernigerode, Rübeland, and Blenkinsburg, something about Thale and its neighbourhood, something about Clausthal and a district of modern Trogodytes, one of whose songs, with musical notes as well as words, is given; something about Grund and its pastoral appearance, something about Brunswick and something about the Harz Mountains themselves; and what there is to learn is told in sprightly, good-humoured, gossiping fashion. If anybody, however, should ask—"Are the Harz Mountains really worth coming to for a summer tour?" the author answers frankly and laconically "No."

Those numerous readers who revel in what may be termed "high-pressure" writing are likely to derive considerable gratification from the two volumes entitled Cross-Cross Journeys, by Walter Thornbury (Hurst and Blackett). The author appears to have travelled in America, Egypt, and Russia, and to have seen men, and cities, and "peraries" (which is "funny" for "prairies"); and in his descriptions he is at one time dramatic, at another comic, at another semi-poetic, and always vivacious—sometimes to the verge of hysterics. Amongst the Americans it seems to have been his fate (of which no man is master) to mix a great deal, if not principally, with the "rowdy" element; and the anecdotes and stories thus picked up, with which he very materially increases the bulk of his volumes, show unmistakable traces of the source from which they came—that is to say, some have a sanguinary tinge, others are more noticeable for the frequency of ejaculations, and most of them are highly redolent of slang; they are nearly all, however, racy and amusing. The contents of the volumes have previously appeared in All the Year Round, and they have whatever additional recommendation may accrue to them from the fact that "the chapters on America describe that country at a most eventful crisis, on the eve of the outbreak of the great civil war," and that "the chapters on Russia were also written not very long before the abolition of serfdom;" perhaps the immediate conclusion at which a sardonic person would arrive from this statement is that the chapters, in both cases, must have been written a long while ago.

HIDE AND SEEK.

You naughty prying children, shame!
Have you not heard of Peeping Tom?
And what a byword he became,
A mark of scorn through Christendom?

From you, Miss Jenny, I expected
Far other conduct, I confess;
But there, thank goodness, you're detected,
For here comes your prim governess;

And such a lecture she'll be reading
Of what decorous is and fitting,
She'll scold you well for your ill-breeding:
There—there—you'd better all be fitting!

Where lovers meet is hallowed ground,
Nor should unconsecrated eye
Within that verge of heaven be found
With sacrilegious glance to spy.

Ah! fairest flower of womanhood—
At least within her lover's eyes;
Yet not so beautiful as good,
Nor fair as she is loving wise.

For see, what pity in her face!
What soul of sorrow brooding there!
As with a sad, deploring grace
She lists to his imploring prayer;

And dreads the fatal word to say
Which yet her face and eyes have spoken:
How can she breathe the fatal may
That sends him from her side heart-broken?

What is the inharmonious fate
That keeps these youthful ones apart?
Since she, 'tis certain, does not hate,
Although she cannot give her heart.

It may be that he speaks too late,
Or that too soon love's tale is told;
For laggards maidens will not wait,
And lovers may be overbold.

Or, from her gracious sweetness he
Perchance has framed his idle dream,
Mistaking her frank courtesy
For love, when 'twas but cold esteem.

Ah! who can probe a woman's heart?
For love by subtle laws is bound,
And scorns analysis of art:
Not always love by love is crowned.

Who knows why bee or butterfly
From all gay flowers that woo the sun
Selects a few, may tell you why
And how a woman's heart is won.

Poor youth, disconsolate, rejected,
Bear like a man your sweet rebuff,
Nor mope in stricken love dejected,
But show you're made of sterner stuff.

Out in the world! Up and be doing!
And when this bitterness is past
As fair a maid may bless your wooing,
And love be met by love at last.

For not for aye will blighting care
Your heart with Dead-Sea ashes strew;
Another love-rose it may bear,
As sweet of scent, as bright of hue.

And you, fair, tender-hearted maid!
Whose blessed mission 'tis to bless,
Why was such task upon you laid
To utter No, instead of Yes?

That dainty mouth was never meant
To mar a wooing lover's bliss;
'Tis Cupid's tiny bow, full bent,
Charged only with a honeyed kiss.

So beautiful, you sway at ease
Each pulsing heart, without endeavour,
As our fair planet rules the seas—
A beauty and a joy for ever.

Be yours the rapture others know;
So, 'stead of that grievous load of sadness,
Your face may wear love's golden glow,
Reflected from your own heart's gladness.

When next we meet, may you be found
Low-bending at the altar-stair,
With fluttering bridesmaids gathered round,
And orange-blossoms in your hair!

JOHN LATREY.

LAW AND POLICE.

Chief Baron Pigott, of the Irish Court of Exchequer, died in Dublin on Monday morning. His Lordship was born in 1805.

A judgment delivered by Sir Barnes Peacock before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council terminates a twelve-years' litigation. An Indian husband was sued by his wife for dower valued at £60,000. He alleged payment, but the High Court of Bengal pronounced him liable, and he appealed to the Privy Council, which sustains the judgment. The wife died during the progress of the suit.

After three days' hearing, the action brought in the Court of Exchequer by Mr. Mackenzie, the engineer, against Lord Claud Hamilton, M.P., and others concerned in a railway project, for the recovery of about £5000, was settled by agreement, a verdict being entered for the plaintiff on certain terms.

The suit of "Warne v. Routledge" came before Sir George Jessel, in the Rolls Court, last week. An application was made, on behalf of Messrs. Warne and Co., publishers, for an injunction to restrain the authoress of the work entitled "How to Dress Like a Lady on £15 a year," and her husband and Messrs. Routledge, publishers, from advertising a new edition of that book. Messrs. Warne and Co. brought out the first edition, and the real question was whether the authoress, after having entered into a contract with them for the bringing out of the work, in doing which they had laid out a considerable sum of money, could enter into an agreement with a different publisher to bring out a second edition. The Master of the Rolls said, as the case would raise an important question under the Married Women's Property Act, it had better stand over till Hilary Term.

A clever case of impersonation was exposed before the Master of the Rolls, yesterday week, in the case of "Donoghue v. Lamb." Mrs. Daw, the owner of certain copyhold property at Notting-hill, had separated from her husband, and been succeeded by a lady who assumed her name. The husband subsequently effected a sale of the property, all the legal forms being complied with by the sham Mrs. Daw. The fraud was only discovered recently; but the genuine Mrs. Daw has succeeded in getting the conveyance set aside.

In the Court of Bankruptcy, on Saturday, an application was made in the case of Mr. D. M. Evans, proprietor of the Hour newspaper, for the appointment of a receiver and for an injunction to restrain proceedings in a number of actions. Mr. Evans had filed a petition in liquidation; the debts were stated at about £30,000, while the assets were calculated at £3500. The application was granted.

The sum of £3000 was yesterday week awarded a young lady named Nuttall, plaintiff, at the Liverpool assizes, in an action for breach of promise, the defendant being Captain Wildes. The gentleman had been divorced from a previous wife, but during the course of his second love he reverted to the first, and broke off his new engagement in order to re-marry the divorcee.

Mrs. Honeyman, a schoolmistress, obtained £500 damages in the Scotch Court of Session, on Monday, before the Lord Justice Clerk and a jury, against Mr. Howe, public-house keeper, Cockburn-street, Edinburgh, for breach of promise of marriage.

For neglecting to send their children to school nineteen persons were yesterday week summoned before the borough magistrates of Southampton by the school board; and one of the defendants refused to pay the fine of five shillings imposed on him, declaring that his three children, of the ages of ten, eight, and six, saved him the wages of a man in wood-chopping. A week was given him for reconsideration of the matter.

Dr. Kenealy was unable to resume his speech in the Tichborne case yesterday week, in consequence of illness. Mr. McMahon, his junior, was also absent, at which the Court expressed surprise; and Mr. Wyld, who has lately come into the case, asked, on behalf of Dr. Kenealy, an adjournment till the date formerly agreed upon for the Christmas holiday—the 29th inst. To this the Court ultimately acceded, but the Lord Chief Justice intimated that the Court would expect the learned counsel to conclude his speech within a week after the date fixed for reassembling.

Herbert Templeman, who is charged with having forged a cheque for £1200, with intent to defraud Messrs. Roberts, Lubbock, and Co., has been committed for trial.

Before Mr. Serjeant Cox, George Smith was, yesterday week, tried for stealing a piano and certain furniture belonging to Mr. Franklin Ranger. The evidence showed that the prisoner had also taken away Mr. Ranger's wife; and the defence was that Mrs. Ranger herself had sold the property of her husband. A verdict of guilty was returned, and the sentence was nine months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

Admiral James Ryder Burton appeared before Mr. Mansfield, the police magistrate, on Thursday week, to answer an extraordinary charge of libel—the prosecutor being Sir Reginald Darnevall, Bart. The defendant, who is eighty years of age, denied the authorship of certain letters imputed to him; but he was bound over in recognisances of £500 to appear, when called upon, at the Central Criminal Court.

A clerk, formerly in the Telegraph Department of the General Post Office, who had retired on a pension, and had applied for its commutation into a lump sum, was yesterday week charged at the Mansion House with having made a false declaration. On applying for a commutation he had filled up a form, stating that he had never required a medical man, whereas inquiries had shown that he was frequently ill, and had retired from the service in consequence of ill-health. He was remanded.

John Coe, of Suffolk-street, Mile-end, has been sent to prison for a month, with hard labour, by the Guildhall Bench, for cruelly over-driving and ill-treating a horse with open sores on the neck and back, which covered the lash with blood that was flowing down the shoulder and leg.

In hearing a charge against a bootmaker of fraudulently pawning his employer's property, the Worship-street magistrate condemned the conduct of the pawnbrokers as extremely reprehensible. He added, for the information of the police, that if the Act were pressed a great deal of property might be saved.

Joseph Bosnach, a diamond polisher, who is accustomed to carry about £1500 worth of precious stones in a bag slung over his shoulder, was attacked by a porter on Holborn Viaduct and had nearly lost his bag. An alarm was raised, and the would-be thief was ultimately arrested in a public-house.

Thomas Hunn, footman to Viscount Cole, has been sentenced to two months' hard labour for brutally assaulting his Lordship's butler, Lady Cole's maid, and a tradesman who interposed to check the prisoner's violence.

At Warwick, yesterday week, Baron Pigott sentenced John Harris to six years' penal servitude and twenty-five strokes with the cat, and James Martin to six years' penal servitude, for a street robbery with violence at Birmingham.

AFTER THE PARTY.—DRAWN BY E. F. BREWSTER.

HIDE AND SEEK.

AFTER THE PARTY.

"The Last Gallop," with its giddy whirl of final ecstasy among the insatiable young dancers, whose condition was forcibly represented in the illustration that appeared in our Christmas Number, has ceased to shake the floor of the ball-room, or rather of the uncarpeted drawing-room, where fifty people have enjoyed themselves from ten o'clock in the evening till four o'clock in the morning. It is time for all to go home: all but the very last of them, as we now perceive, are gone; and these are yet standing upon the doorstep, ready to enter their private or hired broughams, while the polite and genial master of the house, an elderly gentleman with the halo of commercial prosperity around his respectable head, is waiting to dismiss them with a fervent benediction at the starting of the carriages, before he will shut the house door. If he may thank each detachment of the company for the pleasure which their presence has given, it is their part equally to thank him, and his wife and daughters, for the delightful entertainment he has permitted them to share; but we are disposed to think a simple, hearty "Good Night!" is all that need be said on either side, without any such conventional expressions of trumpety gratitude for nothing of a real favour. It is far more important that the young men should help to put on the young ladies their shawls and scarfs, or their opera-cloaks, for the night is cold.

The accounts of the Keble Memorial Fund show that the total sum received has been £50,025 10s. 10d.; being, as Mr. Shaw-Stewart, the treasurer, points out, almost the exact sum asked for at the meeting held in 1866, when the fund was established under the presidency of Archbishop Longley. Of this amount, £7493 has been expended on the purchase of the freehold site of the college; £33,748 on the buildings, including architect's commission and payment to the clerk of the works; £1041 on laying out the quadrangles and terraces; £4684 on furniture and fittings, and the balance for minor expenses. The management of the fund presents a striking contrast to the extravagant arrangements connected with many similar funds, the whole of the working expenses, including cost of office, clerk, postage, printing, &c., only amounting to £772. As additional accommodation is required, it has been determined to build rooms for thirty-six more undergraduates and three tutors, and an extension fund has been opened, to which upwards of £8000 has already been subscribed.

 The above collection of Carols has been gathered from various sources, 8 sometimes from the lips of the rustic singer, sometimes from old MSS., and sometimes from printed books. They have been carefully harmonized and arranged, some as solos, and others for four voices, and may all be played on the Pianoforte alone, or sung by a single voice accompanied by the instrument. The present collection (unlike others) consists of the old traditional Carol tunes, with the original words.

THE ALEXANDRE NEW SEVEN-
GUINRA ORGAN HARMONIUM. Solid Oak Case, Five Octaves, and Two Foot-Boards.
 The ever-increasing musical culture in all classes of society has created a demand for free reed instruments of a superior quality to those hitherto manufactured.
 The instruments now offered to the public will be found directed at all that has hitherto been considered objectionable as regards tone. This end has been obtained by using a larger and thicker tongue, and a new system of voicing, which renders the quality rich and organ-like.
 Another advantage in the new system is the increased strength of the reeds, and diminished liability to go out of tune by forcing the bellows.
 The new system is applied to all the large instruments with still greater effect and without cost.

THE MISSION TO YARKUND: JUNCTION OF THE RIVERS AT KARGIL, LADAK.

THE MISSION TO YARKUND: VALLEY OF THE INDUS AT KULSI, LADAK.

THE YARKUND MISSION IN LADAK.

The diplomatic mission from the Government of British India to the Atalik Ghazee, ruler of Yarkund and Kashgar, in the centre of Asia, arrived at the city of Yarkund on the 8th inst. Its journey was through Ladak, or Middle Thibet, which is the valley of the Upper Indus, situated north-east of Cashmere. It was on Oct. 17 that Mr. Forsyth and his official companions, with their escort and train of servants, numbering 300, entered the Yarkund territory, having marched the distance from Leh, the chief town of Ladak, in fifteen days. Their route lay up the Nubra or Shyok valley, thence crossing the highest mountain passes in the world—that of Daolat Beguldi, at an elevation of 17,200 ft., and the Karakorum, 18,307 ft. high, with the Sasser and Remo glaciers. The cold at night, when they encamped on the bleak highlands, was many degrees below zero, but all the party enjoyed good health. We have been favoured with a sketch and description, by Mr. E. F. Chapman, of the masquerade with which they were entertained at the Buddhist monastery of Hemis, not far below Leh; and we are likewise indebted to the Hon. Jeffery Amherst for sketches of Kargil and Kulsi, two places in Ladak along the route of Mr. Forsyth's journey.

Mr. Chapman writes as follows on Sept. 28:—

"Hemis is one of the richest monasteries in Ladak. Throughout the Upper Indus valley the residences of the Lamas are perched in the most picturesque spots, high up on precipitous crags. I could almost have fancied I had a distant view of Prague, as we came upon one of these singular cities. The background of beautiful hills was surprising—even fairy-like. The Lamas here expected us, and gave us excellent tea, in really antique china cups. These Buddhist clergy are not one whit more interesting here than in other parts of the valley. To us their language was quite unintelligible. They do not seem to have even the thread of their own history; and in the short answers to our questions, received through an interpreter, we could get nothing really explaining their ceremonies beyond the belief that everything they possessed was brought by the founder of their monastery from Lhassa. We had reached Hemis at eleven o'clock. About one o'clock the grand masquerade which was to be performed in our honour was organised. We received an intimation that the players were all ready. We went up into the courtyard of the monastery, and witnessed what at Covent Garden or the Alhambra would draw a full house. The masks and dresses had no tinsel about them, but were genuinely rich. China silks and kincab were mixed up with all kinds of funny head-pieces and continuations. We first went into the robing-room, which was neither more nor less than the chief chapel of Buddha. This was hung with famous old dragon silks of green and yellow, and its lanterns and other furniture were jumbled up with gods and Lamas canonised or glorified. There was a mysterious air about the waving draperies, and out of the dark corners of the place came pouring the wildest masks, with heads of horned pigs, of blue devils and red devils, of kings and goblins, all ready for the dance. The store of dresses exposed here would have excited envy in any theatrical manager. There were about sixty masqueraders, who succeeded each other by twelves in the courtyard. They performed a circular dance, not without action or appreciation of the time kept up by the musicians. Their pace, as the crowd increased and the excitement waxed hotter, became rapid enough, till the whirling and twirling made the whole scene like the puzzle of a kaleidoscope. The Lamas of four monasteries were collected for the occasion, and the balcony of the courtyard was crowded with sombre groups of monks in madder-coloured clothes, solemn-looking and stupid; yet these were the same as those who so spiritedly represented devils of all sorts and mad deities from China. We really enjoyed this spectacle as we sat under a canopy especially prepared for us, and endeavoured to make a sketch, which gives only a feeble representation of the reality."

The Hon. Jeffery Amherst gives us the following notes upon Kargil and Kulsi:—

"Kargil is about sixty miles on the Leh road, from the Zogi-la, the pass out of Cashmere, at the head of the Scinde valley. Just before arriving here the rocks begin gradually to lose their grey tint, and to assume the vivid red and yellow hues which characterise Thibetan scenery. Vegetation now almost entirely disappears, except where a few trees are planted and fields are cultivated in the immediate neighbourhood of the villages. The view taken is at the junction of two rivers. A fort on an island, at this point, commands the two quaint wooden bridges by which the river is crossed. This fort is garrisoned by the Maharajah of Cashmere's soldiers, and there is said to be a political prisoner confined here in an iron cage, in which he can neither stand nor lie down. After crossing the rivers, the road ascends the steep shale-bank opposite. It traverses the two mountain passes of the Nangika-la and the Fotul-a, respectively 13,000 ft. and 13,500 ft. above the sea-level, reaches the valley of the Indus, and crosses the river by a wooden bridge at a place called Kulsi, which is sixty miles from Kargil and fifty from Leh. After the long march over the glaring, arid mountains, it is very pleasant to get beneath the shade of the groves of walnuts, apricots, and apple-trees. The apricots are excellent fruit. There is a good stretch of cultivated land here, the valley opening out to half a mile or so broad. The Indus flows along a deep cutting on the south side of the valley. The people between here and Dras are very civil and honest. They seem wonderfully addicted to the game of polo, almost every village having its walled polo-ground. Shapoo (Ovis vignei), a deer-shaped wild sheep, with huge curling horns, are plentiful on the mountains about here, but are very hard to stalk. The fields along the valley are ranged in terraces, with stone-faced banks, like what one sees in the south of France."

Sir Joseph Cowen, one of the members for Newcastle-on-Tyne, died yesterday week, in his seventy-fourth year; and Mr. Eborall, the general manager of the South-Eastern Railway Company, died on the same day, aged fifty four.

Sir John Pakington addressed a large assembly at Bristol last week, on the occasion of distributing the prizes at the Trade School. He eulogised the school for the great success it had achieved during the past year, and then proceeded to discuss the present aspect of the education question.

Sir James Colquhoun, Bart., three of his gamekeepers, and a boy were drowned, on Thursday week, while crossing Loch Lomond in a boat. Thirteen men in the employment of the Lambeth Water Company were drowned last Saturday, off West Moulsey, Surrey, by the upsetting of a boat in which they and six other men, who were saved, were crossing the Thames on their way home from work. A fire broke out in Dundee last Saturday, which destroyed the premises of the Dundee Calendering Company and seriously injured several adjoining warehouses. A body found at high water-mark near Royal Bay, Jersey, has been identified, by means of photographs sent to Scotland-yard, as that of Mr. Sheppard, a stock-broker, who sustained heavy losses on the Stock Exchange some time ago. About a month back he left London in very depressed spirits.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

For many a long year there was no one who drew so much in the House as Mr. Horsman. It was generally known when he was about to deliver an oration, either indirectly or from the circumstance of his having moved the adjournment of some full-dress debate, for in none other did he condescend to intervene. His speeches were, so to speak, at once organised dissertations, full of points and epigrams, weighty, solemn, and they were of prodigious length. One peculiarity he developed, and that was, at the end, say, of every quarter of an hour, leading up to a climax and what sounded like an effective peroration, and stopping short—but only to take a fresh departure, again to elaborate for a considerable space, and then perorate again. It was amusing to see, each time when this occurred, half a dozen aspirants for the hearing start up and have to sit down, amidst shouts of laughter, which were not even very consonant with the subject-matter of Mr. Horsman's eloquence. Notice is taken of this specialty of his, because it seems that, being on a discoursing visit to his constituents at Stroud, he has adopted a plan which some people may have thought that he might have followed in the House—that is, he has divided his oration into four parts, and delivered each separately, on different but sequential occasions. It can be understood how pleasant this mode of liberating his mind must be to him; for, his powers of continuing being illimitable, he was able to go on, in a certain sense, in an everlasting flow, without calling too heavily upon his strength either of legs or lungs. As may be supposed, in such a cataract of speeches something of wordiness and something of repetition were inevitable; but there are few members who could have kept up a monologue in four parts with so much vigour and variety. In a manner, each section of the dissertation had its subject; but, as a whole, it would seem that he endeavoured to illustrate that elastic Liberalism—now advancing to Radicalism, now receding to Conservatism—of which Mr. Horsman is a particular type. One of his assertions was alarming; for, quoting a dictum of Lord Melbourne—a great maker of apothegms—he solemnly laid it down that in the next generation the most prominent characteristic would be religious controversy; a very serious prospect for quiet people who hold with another maxim of Lord Melbourne, in relation to stirring up of matter of controversy, "Can't you let it alone."

The reason for the appearance of Mr. Stanfield at Liverpool is not too apparent on the face of it; and, that being so, it may be permitted to suggest that his doing so is a part of a scheme to which allusion was made a few weeks ago in this column, and which consisted in sending likely members of the Government into the provinces to vindicate its policy and proclaim its good works. Perhaps the President of the Local Government Board was more easy, less embarrassed, than when he was rendering himself before his constituents at Halifax the other day. He seemed to have now little or no fear about the education difficulty, and was more confident about its solution through the medium of the three motions of private members which, he says, are to be brought forward next Session; and again, observing what he said, the idea suggests itself that the subject-matter of those motions may, perhaps, be made open questions in the Cabinet. On the whole, Mr. Stanfield was more buoyant than he generally thinks fit to be since he has had responsibilities to consider—more like the ardent young Radical of ten years ago, and therefore, as may be supposed, his speech was a success. Supposing that he wanted such a thing, Mr. Rathbone may be said to have come forward to stand sponsor for Mr. Stanfield at Liverpool, and played second fiddle with all propriety. If the Liverpoolians, as is most likely, have conceived a notion of the position in the House of their Liberal member, they will be aware that that of Mr. Rathbone is a good one, and that his contributions to debate are remarkable for the good sense, judgment, and also for the earnestness and steadiness of conviction which they display; and, on the whole, it may be said of him that he is a more appropriate representative of a commercial city than either of his colleagues—one of whom, however, is known to possess high qualities, but of rather a dilettante kind; while the other is too new in the House for a decided opinion to be formed of him.

There has been a "Conservative Demonstration" at Wigan which had for its object the extension of that Toryism which, it is asserted, almost pervades Lancashire, to the borough, which, despite powerful aristocratic influence, now returns two steady Liberals. This was avowed by Mr. Charles Turner, who is now getting venerable as a man and as a member, but who is still an assiduous attendant in the House, presenting always a striking figure in a particular place on the Opposition side. He seems to think Lancashire the very haven of Conservatism, and that the Liberal representation of Wigan is a blot which ought immediately to be got rid of. Then there was Mr. R. A. Cross, who seized the opportunity for delivering an address akin to those dry, hard, critical speeches which he is remarkable for in the Legislature, in the course of which he says severe things, but with so unviolent a voice and manner, there is such a pleasant smile upon his countenance the while, that his little bitternesses seem to be more effective than if he was to bounce and roar and hiss them out through his clenched teeth, as is the manner of some who seek to be censors like him. Now he fell upon the Ministry, and spared not, working into every chink in their armour which was made last Session. With his usual volubility and force Mr. F. S. Powell made his contribution to the occasion, and, as is his wont, infused a religious and educational element into his prolixion, and it may be said that his speech would have done very well for an introduction to the toast of "Church and State." There, too, was Mr. Charley, who seems ubiquitous in Lancashire, and, though some sceptical people may doubt it, is unquestionably a personage in that county. At every Conservative gathering there he is certain to be prominently visible, even supposing so strange a thing to happen as his not speaking; for he is, so to speak, a master of by-play on a platform, and leads applause and laughter, on due provocation, with great energy. Lately, at some meeting in Lancashire, he was delivered of a speech, whose comic critic has said was in the style of the once famous "Comic History of England." It is but fair to say that, in the face of much prejudice and of a somewhat organised attempt to keep him down, Mr. Charley has attained to such a position in the House that, at least when he introduces a motion, he is well listened to; and he has achieved a distinction not easily gained by a private member—that of having absolutely carried several bills into Acts of Parliament. It is true that some of them have required subsequent amendment; but there are few measures of which that may not be predicated, and the merit is the having passed by his own efforts any bill at all.

Ashton-under-Lyne is one of the parts of Lancashire which, at the last election, vindicated the assertion that that county is eminently Conservative; for it rejected a long-tried Liberal and a gentleman of mark in the political and official world—no less than Mr. Milner Gibson—and returned a local manufacturer. No sturdier advocate of the opinions he espouses than Mr. Mellor could be found, and in his way he has become remarkable in the House. He seldom ever utters there more than two or three sentences, but they are downright, not without vigour from his point of view, and always denunciatory of what he thinks abuses, no matter who is responsible, while his quaint accent and phraseology give a raciness to what he says. He has been lately foregathering with his constituents, and giving them an exact though enlarged taste of the qualities which he exhibits in his place in Parliament, doubtless with a similar if not more powerful effect.

Sir Richard Torrens is a specialty in the way of membership; for he is a returned Australian official and legislator, and it is his cue occasionally to point out how the young colonies can, so to speak, "teach their grandmother to suck eggs." He is sensible, but sententious, and by no means enlivening; but he made an effort to be enlivening when before his constituents a day or two ago, by the coolness and boldness with which he ventured to come into hostile opinion with Mr. Bright, and to treat that gentleman's theory of a "free breakfast" as a fallacy, and this not without giving apt reasons.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

After a postponement of nearly a week, owing to the frost, the Kingsbury Meeting was brought to a conclusion on Tuesday and Wednesday, last week. Exiles from the flat had it all their own way, General carrying off another hurdle-race in fine style; still, plating at Kingsbury is a sad descent for a Criterion winner. Sunny and Copernicus, also ex-flat-racers, each won a race; but Judge was not so fortunate, as Royalist beat him by twenty lengths for the Great Metropolitan Steeplechase.

Turf statistics have been poured upon us in such overwhelming columns during the past week or two that we can only glance at them very briefly. Commencing with winning owners, we find that M. Lefevre is again at the head of the poll, the 104 victories of his horses having credited him with £25,803. Mr. Merry's average is far better, for though the "yellow, black cap" has only been placed first on twenty-five occasions, yet his winnings amount to £20,038, as they may well do, when we remember that he secured both Derby and Oaks, and then looked on while the St. Leger was fought out by his Epsom champions. Mr. Savile, thanks chiefly to those hard-working animals Kaiser and Uhlán, has won exactly the same number of races as Mr. Merry, but they are only worth £11,760; while Mr. Fisher's twenty-seven successes produced £9310. Mr. Crawford (£7988) and Lord Falmouth (£7622) run a very close race, and the luckless disqualification of Andred for the Royal Stakes was the cause of the latter's defeat. Considering that he has very few horses in training, Mr. Bowes (£4958) holds a very satisfactory position; and, following him, come Lord Lonsdale (£4547), Mr. Brayley (£3625), Mr. Joseph Dawson (£3466), and Mr. Bruton (£3385). As instances of the fickleness of fortune, we may note that Baron Rothschild has only secured eleven races, of the value of £2523; while Sir Joseph Hawley figures even lower in the list, with only four events, worth £950. Turning to the performers themselves, we find Westminster heading the aged horses, the Lincolnshire Handicap, his solitary victory, being worth £1065; Oxonian (£948), is the only one at all approaching him. Syrian (£1375) had only to win three times to place him before any other six-year-old; and even the two victories of Falkland (£1105) enabled him to beat Roquefort (£965), though the last named won seven events. Mornington (£2720) gained the premier position among the five-year-olds, chiefly by his very creditable "double-first" at Epsom; Field Marshal (£2027) has also done very well; and then come Sister Helen (£1525), Houghton (£1505), Flurry (£1060), and Sterling (£995). The struggle among the four-year-olds was somewhat close, but the Shrewsbury week gave the first place to King Lud (£3032), next to whom comes Uhlán (£2755); while Prince Charlie (£2450), in spite of a splendid record of ten victories undimmed by a single defeat, is only third. Among the "threes" Marie Stuart is the undisputed prima donna, as her six wins realised the large sum of £10,135. Kaiser (£6305) has gained one more victory than the filly, and his persistent rival, Gang Forward (£5000), is third. In spite of the "blue ribbon," his solitary success, Doncaster (£4825) is only fourth; and then follow Cecilia (£3025), Montargis (£2270), Flagolet (£2250), and Chivalrous (£2081). M. Lefevre's stable supplies five of the twelve leading juveniles, and the first place is worthily filled by the flying Ecossais (£3600). Nothing has yet been able to get near him, and it is a sad pity that, from the state of his forelegs, he is quite as likely never to see another starting-post as to win the Derby by a dozen lengths. The Middle Park Plate puts Newry (£3070) in the second place, Couronne de Fer (£2405) is third, and the undefeated Miss Toto (£2385) fourth. Blair Athol is once more first of the sires, his stock having secured no less than eighty-four races, worth £18,482; and if his children only displayed stamina at all commensurate with their speed, he would be a most worthy successor to his sire, Stockwell. That defunct hero is second, with £13,650; but Scottish Chief (£13,505) presses him very hard. Lord Clifden (£9291) well maintains his position with forty-four races to the credit of his representatives, and Adventurer (£6813), King Tom (£6389), Macaroni (£6501), Skirmisher (£6347), and Thunderbolt (£6367) have all held their own, which is more than can be said of Beadsman (£2473), Lord Lyon (£714), Parmesan (£2959), Trumpeter (£3170), and Voltigeur (£1600).

We hear by telegram of the safe arrival of the English cricketers at Melbourne. They are all well, and have commenced practice.

The billiard season was inaugurated with a handicap promoted by W. Cook, the champion, which proved the most successful affair of the kind which has ever taken place. It was played at the Guildhall Tavern, and occupied six evenings. We append a full return:—

FIRST ROUND.

FINAL GAMES.
W. Cook (scratch)	beat	L. Kilkenny (130)	by 36 "
W. Cook (scratch)	"	L. Kilkenny (130)	by 337 "

Each game was 500 up; and we would suggest that on a future occasion the number of points should be increased to 600 or 700, and the handicap limited to twelve players, as men like Dufton, Hughes, Stammers, and John Bennett would have had no chance with far more points than they received. The result of the week's play afforded one more proof that all-round players, however good, have no chance against the deadly spot stroke, and it was, therefore, not surprising that old-fashioned players like Evans and Morris were put out in the first round, though both, especially the former, played a thoroughly sound, good game. T. Taylor was out of form, and decidedly disappointed his admirers; while F. Bennett, though he has improved wonderfully of late, was completely "chopped" at starting by John Roberts, jun., and had little chance of exhibiting his play. S. W. Stanley played wonderfully well, making breaks of 209, 172, and 108 in the course of his three games. The precision and rapidity with which he makes "spot" hazards are very remarkable, and he was credited with the largest number—sixty-six—in succession that was made during the handicap. His all-round play, although still deficient, shows a good deal of improvement, and, with more practice in this branch of the game, he bids fair to prove a very dangerous opponent to Joseph Bennett and John Roberts, jun. With the exception of the game with Morris, when he missed several easy strokes, Cook's play was magnificent, as such breaks as 99, 143, 155, 206, 109, 110, 219, and 430 amply testify; and Kilkenny pleased everyone by his steady, careful performance, while Alfred Bennett fairly "brought down the house" with some marvellous cannons and losing hazards. All the arrangements were excellent, and D. Ingarfield marked the games with great precision and distinctness.

After months of controversy, J. H. Sadler and R. Bagnall are at length matched to scull for the championship of England. The event will take place on April 16, under the old rules of boat-racing. We are glad that Sadler has steadily refused to row on the Tyne, for Putney to Mortlake is the proper course for championship contests.

THE GOVERNMENT AND RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

Sir Daniel Gooch, M.P., chairman of the Great Western Railway, replies to the circular of the Board of Trade respecting the alleged insecurity of railway travelling. The hon. Baronet reminds Mr. Chichester Fortescue that, during a period of seven years, including 1872, one passenger lost his life and 247 sustained personal injuries (many of them being of the slightest possible character), from causes beyond their own control, whilst travelling in passenger-trains over this company's lines. In 1872 (being the year specially referred to in Captain Tyler's report) the company carried 32,800,000 passengers and conveyed 11,777,072 tons of goods and minerals, running 18,390,047 train miles, and it was in this year that the one death of a passenger above referred to took place. Sir Daniel then proceeds to examine the charges which the company was challenged to answer, stating that, while on all matters referred to the directors are ready to make every effort in their power to meet the reasonable demands of the public and of Parliament, they cannot but deprecate that minute, and at the same time irresponsible interference—with which they are not indistinctly threatened—with the management of an undertaking for the conduct of which the directors are to be held ultimately responsible, believing, as they do, that such interference, whether legislative or administrative, will prove as injurious to the interests and safety of the public as to the interests of their own shareholders.

Mr. E. S. Ellis, chairman of the Midland Railway, has also replied to the Board of Trade circular. He points out that, with regard to the frequency of accidents, an examination of the reports of the officers of the Board of Trade will show that the number of casualties in 1872 exhibits a decrease on a fair comparison with former years, notwithstanding the very largely increased traffic and the constantly growing requirements of the public—a result which could only be obtained by the closest care and watchfulness on the part of those entrusted with railway management. It was possible that much of the alarm which has given rise to Mr. Fortescue's letter has resulted from comparisons drawn from imperfect data. The Act of Parliament passed in 1872 requires accidents to be reported which were not reported in previous years; many of these do not involve danger to passengers, but, in consequence of their being now for the first time included in these reports, a feeling of alarm has been created which, with a full knowledge of the facts, would not have existed. Mr. Ellis shows that upon the Midland Railway, during the year 1872, there were, with the very large number of 21,308,639 passengers, exclusive of season ticket holders, who travelled on the line, only two fatal accidents to passengers. One of these accidents was caused by a passenger jumping from a train, and the other by a door having become open from some unexplained cause after the train had started.

Mr. Moon has replied for the London and North-Western Railway Company to the circular. He starts with a statement that during the year 1872 the company carried above 37,000,000 passengers without a death from causes within their own control. From this reckoning he excludes "the melancholy Wigan accident, which has not been proved to have resulted from any defective arrangements of the company." In pointing out what has been done to prevent accidents he sets first the liberal expenditure they had made on their permanent way and rolling stock. The block system is now applied to a great part of the line. The interlocking of points and signals is an improvement as to which Mr. Moon claims priority for his company, which is now, he says, expending upon it about £80,000 per annum. He goes further than the chairmen of the Brighton and South-Western companies in approving of the continuous brake. The North-Western had purchased a patent as long ago as 1863, but had found it only partially suitable for their traffic. A recent modification of one of the old patents is being tested on their metropolitan trains, and, so far, has fulfilled expectations. In answer to the charge of defective accommodation, Mr. Moon alleges that during the past five years they have expended four millions in doubling lines, enlarging stations, and increasing the number of sidings. His reply to the complaint of unpunctuality is that it can only be remedied by reducing the speed of the trains.

SAVING LIFE.

At a meeting of the Royal Humane Society, held at the office, Trafalgar-square, on Tuesday week—Mr. W. Hawes in the chair—a number of cases of saving life were brought under the notice of the society, which bestowed its rewards as follow:—On the recommendation of the Earl of Kimberley, the bronze medal was unanimously voted to a police constable named Shotwell, on duty at Flat Island, Mauritius, for saving an Indian woman who was in danger of drowning there on Sept. 12 last. Hearing cries of distress from the water, Shotwell proceeded to the spot and plunged in, and, after several unsuccessful attempts, owing to the rapid current, ultimately reached the place where he had seen the woman sink. By great efforts he reached an adjacent rock, and on looking into the water saw her settling down to the bottom, at about twenty yards from where he stood. He then dived after her, but such was the force of the under-current that he had, much exhausted, to climb upon the rock again. All this was but the work of a few minutes; but, diving again, he grasped the insensible woman and swam with her to the rock. Here he succeeded in restoring animation in the poor woman, and, after resting with her for a short time, he started with his burden for the shore, which he reached in safety, though much cut and bruised through the efforts he had made.

A testimonial, inscribed on vellum, recording the nature of the services rendered, was presented to Lewis Pique, for going to the rescue of Stephen Murphy, who was blown into the water by the accidental discharge of a gun off the Admiralty Pier, Dover, on the 22nd ult. The unfortunate man was blown a distance of 40 ft. from the pier into 65 ft. of water; and, his eyes being injured by the powder and one of his arms nearly torn from the socket, he was utterly incapable of swimming or helping himself. Obtaining a rope, Pique took one end in his left hand, and, giving the other to a comrade, let himself down into the water, and, striking out with his right arm, succeeded in reaching the drowning man.

A similar reward was given to F. Baaden, seaman instructor of the Chichester training-ship, lying off Greenhithe, for saving James Collis, who fell overboard into seven fathoms of water, on the 18th ult.

A pecuniary reward was given to Thomas Prescott, for endeavouring (unfortunately without success) to save Frances Gale, who jumped into the Serpentine, near the bridge, where the water is 6 ft. deep. Prescott, who heard the splash in the water, at once, without removing his clothes, waded out to the second arch of the bridge, and used every effort to recover the body. His clothes, however, so impeded his efforts, that he went to the shore and removed them, and again went into the water. After the lapse of a few minutes the body was recovered by means of one of the society's drags; but, although every effort was used, the officers were unable to restore animation.

The list of those examined and approved for the Previous Examination, or "Little Go," at Cambridge, has been published. The first class contains 160 names, and the second class 77; in the additional subjects 116 are approved. The list of candidates, compared with those approved, shows the following results:—Of the 64 candidates for the ordinary and additional subjects, 47 satisfied the examiners; of the 254 who were examined in the ordinary subjects only, 190 were approved; and out of 97 candidates for the additional subjects only, 64 have passed. Mr. J. A. Foote, B.A., has been elected M'Mahon Student in Law at St. John's. Mr. Foote is a scholar of the college, and obtained a first class in the classical tripos 1872. In this year he was the successful candidate for the Chancellor's medal for legal studies, and was elected senior scholar in international law on the foundation of Dr. Whewell. The prize given by the members for Cambridge University for the English essay has been adjudged to George Chrystal, of St. Peter's College. Dr. Hayman has been dismissed from the office of Head Master of Rugby School by a unanimous vote of the governing body, and will retire from his office at Easter.

Speech day was observed at St. Paul's School on Thursday week, and the prizes distributed. The Rev. Dr. Kynaston, Head Master, presided, and the governor and members of the court of assistants of the Company of Mercers were present in official costume.

Doctors' day at the Merchant Taylors' School witnessed a crowded gathering of relatives and friends of the pupils. The Head Master read a long list of honours gained during the year by past and present scholars. Great satisfaction was expressed with the readings from English, French, and ancient classics.

Last Saturday Lord Derby delivered the half-yearly prizes to the pupils of the Liverpool College, and spoke at some length upon the uses of mental culture in enabling his hearers to discharge the duties and responsibilities of life.

The 252nd anniversary of the founder of the Charterhouse was recently celebrated in the ancient house of the school. After service in the chapel about a hundred sat down to dinner, under the presidency of the master of the hospital, the Rev. Dr. Currey, who was supported by Lord Devon, Sir Edmund Lechmere, Mr. Dawson-Damer, and others.

The Bishop of Lichfield presided at the prize distribution at the Queen Elizabeth Grammar School, Ashburne. The speeches were well delivered, in Greek, Latin, French, and English, to a fashionable audience. The Bishop congratulated the Head Master on the satisfactory condition of the school.

On Thursday week the prize-giving at Cheltenham College took place as usual. Mr. Jex Blake, in giving away the prizes, remarked that the term had been totally free from all disturbances, and, as far as work went, had been very successful. The chief point noticeable in the actual prize-giving was the number of prizes gained on the modern side by the Fellows in Mr. Green's house. In the afternoon the "Past v. Present" football-match took place; the Past, who played thirty-five to the Present's twenty-six, winning by fifteen points to one. For them F. H. Chellor, G. Onslow, and W. G. Collins were very conspicuous. The concert was a great success.

The state apartments of Windsor Castle are open to the public.

A contract for the construction of a landing-stage at Birkenhead, which is expected to cost £50,000, has been accepted by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

The anniversary known as the shutting of the gates of Derry was celebrated, on Thursday week, with much enthusiasm on the part of the Protestant population of that city.

The committee of the Royal Orthopedic Hospital, 315, Oxford-street, have received a third donation of £1000 from "D. W."

The Fishmongers' Company of London have forwarded (through Mr. George Moore, of Bow-churchyard) fifty guineas towards the funds of the London Cabmen's Mission. The promoters of the mission have erected a spacious hall at King's-cross, and £1300 is wanted to place this building out of debt. The work of the mission among the 12,000 cabmen in London has so far met with the best results.

The Duke of Edinburgh, yesterday week, laid the first stone of the building for the National Training School for Music which Mr. Freake has undertaken to erect at his own cost at South Kensington. Several well-known musicians and other gentlemen were present. The Rev. Canon Brookfield read a prayer at the close of the ceremony. In the evening the event was celebrated by a conversazione in the Albert Hall, at which the Duke of Edinburgh was present.

The approaching marriage of the Duke of Edinburgh was the first topic brought before the Court of Common Council on Thursday week, by the Lord Mayor, and notice was given by Mr. M'George, chairman of the City lands committee, of a motion for an address of congratulation to her Majesty.—In the matter of Mr. Melville's great civic picture, the Parliamentary Committee has recommended that the Court of Common Council should do nothing. The twelve councillors whom Mr. Melville has served with writs will, therefore, have to defend themselves.—During a sitting of the Court of Aldermen intelligence was received of the death of Mr. Woodthorpe, the late town clerk. He had held the office since 1859 till a few months ago. His father and grandfather had occupied it before him.

At a meeting of the Chemical Society, on Thursday week—Dr. Odling, F.R.S., president, in the chair—a paper "On the Preparation of Standard Trial-Plates to be Used in Verifying the Composition of the Coinage" was read by the author, Mr. W. C. Roberts, chemist of the Royal Mint. After giving a sketch of the variation in composition of the English gold and silver coins from the earliest times, he noticed the various trial-plates which had been prepared since 1660, showing that they sometimes varied considerably from the standard of 916.66 parts in 1000 for the gold and 923.0 for the silver. He then proceeded to describe the process employed and the difficulties to be overcome in the preparation of the new standard trial-plates. These were exhibited at the meeting, and also a magnificent specimen of pure crystallised gold. The other papers read were "Researches on the Action of the Couple on Organic Bodies Part IV. on Iodide of Allyl, by Dr. J. H. Gladstone and Mr. A. Tribe, being a continuation of their investigations on this subject; "On Tetranickelous Phosphide," by Dr. R. Schenck; "On Ferrous Anhydrosulphate," by Mr. T. Bolas—the compound, which is crystalline, is precipitated on mixing an aqueous solution of green vitriol with about nine times its volume of concentrated sulphuric acid. The last paper was "On the Hydrochloride of Narceine," by Dr. C. R. A. Wright; after which the meeting was adjourned until Thursday, Jan. 15, 1874, when the following papers will be read:—"On the Action of Trichloroacetyl Chloride on Amines I. Action on Aniline," by Dr. Tommasi and Mr. R. Meldola; "Researches on the Action of the Copper-Zinc Couple on Organic Bodies Part V. on Ethyl Bromide," by Dr. J. H. Gladstone and Mr. A. Tribe.

THE MISSION TO YARKUND: MASQUERADE AT THE BUDDHIST MONASTERY OF HEMS, LADAK.

AN ITALIAN CHURCH AT CHRISTMAS.

The Roman Catholic Church in Southern Europe has shown a certain degree of condescension to the less advanced state of intellectual culture among the labouring classes—for instance, among the peasantry of the Neapolitan and Roman provinces. It has permitted, at the discretion of the parochial clergy, but presumably with the sanction of their bishops, the use of pictures and images not only for the permanent adornment of a sacred edifice, but in a peculiar manner for the visible representation of Bible history upon such occasions as the great festivals of the Christian year. In the judgment of ordinary English Protestants, such an exhibition as that of a set of figures modelled and arranged, with a landscape background, to display the chief incidents of Our Saviour's life, cannot but seem liable to serious objections, as tending to materialise the popular conceptions of that sublime and most holy theme of the evangelical narrative. The Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau is, perhaps, a not less questionable form of artificial presentment of these mighty facts, which are enshrined in the common creed of Christendom, to the eyes of a gazing crowd, some of whom may possibly be tempted to regard it more as an artistic entertainment than as a proclamation of Divine truth for the saving of souls. With these prudential doubts and scruples upon the ground of the highest expediency, but with no bigoted antagonism to the ideas and practices of a large part of mankind, whose religious sentiments deserve to be respected as much as his own, the liberal-minded English visitor to Rome or Naples at Christmas may look upon such an exhibition in the churches. He will not, if his own Christian faith have taught him the wisdom of charity, be disposed to impugn the motives of those by whom this ingenious preparation has been made for the purpose, as they intend and expect, of teaching a sacred lesson. But he will prefer the Bible classes and Sunday schools of our own country.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

The firm of Messrs. Augener and Co. has been for some years honourably distinguished by its many reprints of classical music, both vocal and instrumental. Some of these editions are in large library size, others in that smaller form which is not only more portable and handier for immediate reference, but also enables the purchaser to comprise an extensive collection of masterpieces in a limited space and at very inconsiderable cost. Among the most recent and most important of Messrs. Augener's publications of the latter kind are the first two volumes of what will be the only complete uniform edition of the pianoforte works of Robert Schumann. This commencing instalment is beautifully engraved on good paper, and comprises the works, in regular order, classed as op. 1 to op. 21 inclusive. Among these are the exquisite pieces entitled "Papillons," "Die Davidsbündler," "Carneval," "Fantasiestück," "Etudes Symphoniques," the first and second sonatas, "Kreisleriana," the Fantasia dedicated to Liszt, and the "Novelletten," besides others of equal beauty, although less known. A memoir of Schumann is given, and his own indications (in German) of tempo, &c., are retained, Italian equivalents being added, and explanatory notes in English as to the significance of some of the pieces. That volumes of such high intrinsic worth, so well got up, and of such extent (273 pages), can be purchased for six shillings each is a wonder even in these days of cheapness.

The series of pianoforte studies reprinted by Messrs. Augener (in full library size) forms a collection of high value both to students and teachers. Notwithstanding the many years that have elapsed, and the changes of style that have occurred, since the original production of Cramer's studies, they will never be superseded as a sound basis for classical pianoforte-playing. A new edition of these is being issued by Messrs. Augener, who have also republished Henselt's first set of studies (models of the romantic school); twelve of those of Kalkbrenner, op. 143 (charming specimens of the brilliant style); and the whole (six books) of the series by Louis Kuller, a valuable modern work, embracing every degree of mechanism, from early studentship to thorough command of the key-board. Herr Pauer has edited all these publications.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal (Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.) maintains its character for the interest and variety of the contents. A third volume is now in course of publication. The current number (the twentieth of the entire issue) contains seven pieces in various styles, commencing with a well-written and effective "Allegro," by Herr Werner, of Witzendorf. This is followed by a pleasing andante, entitled "The Lake, a Sketch," by Dr. Spark (of Leeds), the editor of the work; after which comes an "Offertoire," by Hamilton Clarke, in which are some well-contrasted effects. A "Larghetto," by C. F. Frost, may be turned to good account as a "middle voluntary;" as likewise may be the following "Moderato Assai," by Philipp Tietz. A cleverly-written fugue on the subject of the psalm-tune known as "St. Stephen's," by R. Fieldwick, completes the collection.

Among the recent issues of instrumental music by Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. we may point to their continuation of Mr. G. F. West's series of "Gems from the Great Masters," No. 17 of which consists of an adaptation (for piano solo) of Handel's "O lovely peace" (from his "Judas Maccabeus"), with the leading passages fingered for the guidance of young students. The same adapter has strung together some extracts from the different movements of Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," also fingered and intended for juvenile learners.

Of the two new compositions recently produced at Glasgow, and their successful reception, we spoke in our notices of the festival just held there. They are now published, both in that convenient and inexpensive large octavo form which has lately prevailed. Mr. Henry Smart's "Jacob" is issued by Messrs. Cramer and Co.; and the smaller work of Mr. H. A. Lambeth (a setting of the Eighty-sixth Psalm) is brought out by the firm of Messrs. Swan and Pentland, Glasgow.

"The New Graduated Method for the Pianoforte," by Joseph Goddard (Messrs. Goddard and Co.), appears to be a well-digested code of instructions for students of that instrument, judging from the first part, which is to be followed by three more divisions. In the portion now referred to, judicious directions are given for the position of the hands (with diagrams); with elementary exercises, some for the pupil alone, others with an accompanying part for the teacher. The work is brought out at a small cost, and promises to be, when complete, a very good one of its kind.

"Before the Cross, and other Hymns" (Metzler and Co.) is a series of six sacred pieces, with no name of author or composer, beyond a statement that three of the hymns are reprinted from Messrs. Moxon's new edition of Rowland Brown's "Songs and Poems." The music is, in each instance, in a serious, devotional style, appropriate to the text; and its simplicity and the limited range of voice required render it generally available.

ILLUSTRATED NEW BOOKS.

The great work of the French traveller and naturalist, Paul Marcoy, A Journey Across South America, with its profuse accompaniment of fine wood engravings, designed by E. Riou, from the traveller's sketches, has repeatedly been mentioned on the publication of its serial parts. These are called by Messrs. Blackie and Son "half volumes," but are substantially and very handsomely bound. The fourth of such portions, completing Marcoy's narrative, was issued during the past season. It is worthy of conspicuous mention among the many illustrated books of travel and geographical discovery or survey which have recently made their appearance. It is chiefly occupied with the descent of the great Brazilian river Marañon or Amazons, from Nauta and Tabatinga, on the frontiers of Peru, down to Santa Maria de Belen, in Para, on the Atlantic coast. A set of clear and accurate maps, drawn by Marcoy himself, render his progress intelligible to the reader. The abundance of novel and striking incidents, the anecdotes of savage or semi-civilised life and manners, the peculiar experiences of the Roman Catholic missions, in that remote and secluded region, the contributions to natural science and history, more especially to zoology and botany, which are levied from its exploration, make his work both attractive and instructive. The preface, by Mr. Elihu Rich, bears just witness to its value; and its interest will be rather enhanced by President Grant's recent announcement of a surveying expedition to be sent up the Amazons by the United States Government, with the consent of the Brazilian Empire.

The first volume of Old and New London, published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, has been completed in serial parts. It is compiled by Mr. Walter Thornbury, an approved writer of topography; but he has been placed at a great disadvantage for the literary treatment of his subject as a whole by the obligation to follow and notice a miscellaneous crowd of things, places, or persons, represented in the numerous woodcuts regardless of historical order. Fleet-street, with Temple Bar, the Temple, and Whitefriars, has always seemed an inexhaustible mine of biographical associations; for a legion of famous English authors, wits, scholars, and lawyers have frequented this part of town. Blackfriars, Ludgate-hill, and St. Paul's-churchyard, with its Cathedral, Paternoster-row, and Doctors'-commons, come next under Mr. Thornbury's review; thence he proceeds along Cheapside to Guildhall and the Mansion House, to the Bank and the Royal Exchange, and takes us in this volume as far as the Monument, where he discourses on the Great Fire. It is by no means a history of London, but an antiquarian ramble, like that of Mr. Jesse, through London, which we noticed two years ago. The illustrations are seldom new, but they have still a fair degree of interest.

Mr. G. A. Simcox, of Queen's College, Oxford, author of some essays in poetry and criticism of the classical school, has often sought recreation in long pedestrian journeys through our own country and in tours here or there in Continental Europe. His Recollections of a Rambler (Chapman and Hall) are the expression of a tasteful and thoughtful mind, with whose meditative mood one would be happy to sympathise, if one ever had any leisure; but his style is too lengthy, and he is too much addicted to analysing his own ideas and sentiments, for the general reader of this hasty age. It is a very slow book, though not a dull one; and we doubt whether it can be made popular by the expedient of reprinting a large number of old landscape views, by many of the best English artists, which do not look so fresh as when they first appeared. Another publication of which, in deference to the amateur author and artist, we should desire to speak with respect, is The King's Banner: An Original Semi-Historical Drama (H. S. King and Co.). It is written by a lady, Mrs. George Cresswell, who has been disappointed in her hope of getting a manager to accept it for the stage. Captain Cresswell has, therefore, designed and etched five illustrations, with the aid of which it may present itself to the reader of five-act plays in prose—if such a reader can be found in the modern world—almost as well as though it were acted at the Dublin Theatre. The historical interest mainly turns on the escape of Charles II. from pursuit after the battle of Worcester. We only wish that the joint work of Captain and Mrs. Cresswell may be received with fair appreciation of its merits.

There is no reason why a treatise of ornithology, or one of practical bird-keeping, with such excellent pictorial illustrations as those of Pheasants, for Coverts and Aviaries, should not be ranked in this ornamental class of books. Mr. W. B. Tegetmeier, who is a high authority on poultry, has equally, we believe, a good claim to the attention of readers desiring sound information or safe advice upon this half-domesticated species of game; he has certainly the power of making his subject easily intelligible, and of putting his knowledge into an agreeable form. The engravings are drawn from life by Mr. T. W. Wood; they are spirited and truthful; and the pheasant is a noble fellow, deserving of an artist's skill.

Several of the prettiest, nicest, and wholesomest books for children (these superlatives appeal to their mothers' judgment) were commended in our last week's review of illustrated volumes. We must not, however, omit to recognise this time, as in former seasons, the charming little pictures of child-life drawn by Oscar Pletsch, whom we like almost as well as Lorenz Fröhlich in this department. He is to be met with in Happy Spring Time, published by Macmillan; and it is Mrs. Charles Heaton, the biographer of Albert Dürer and of Leonardo da Vinci, who has composed the sweet and simple nursery rhymes.

A translation, by F. E. Bunnett, of Dr. Lübke's History of Sculpture (Smith, Elder, and Co.) forms two volumes of considerable value to the student of art. The first volume contains 216 woodcuts, and in the second there are 377, representing a selection of the best specimens of every school and period, Asiatic, Grecian, Italian, Byzantine and Gothic, Renaissance, and Modern. The author, a professor of the Polytechnic Institute at Stuttgart, has earned a high reputation for such critical researches, and much weight is due to his estimation of the rank and place of different works in the progress of this classic art. His descriptions appear to be minutely accurate; and though his style may be felt to be rather dry, it is not to the general reader that a book of this kind is offered, but to those who seek a particular course of instruction.

For a wedding gift, if not for Christmas, one might fitly choose The Bridal Bouquet, culled in the Garden of Literature, by Henry Southgate, the publishers of which are Messrs. Lockwood and Co. It is appropriately dedicated to the women of England, and the editor has deserved the reward of their approving smile. He has gathered from a vast range of good English prose and verse, comprising five or six hundred authors of different ages, an immense store of wise, tender, and graceful sentiments or fancies, belonging to the pure passion of chaste love and its lawful consummation in the sacrament of marriage. The illustrations, designed by Mr. J. D. Watson, Mr. Wimperia, and Mr. T. Kennedy, are engraved under the direction of Mr. J. D. Cooper; there are some thirty of these engravings to adorn the volume.

CURIOUS WILLS.

WILL OF LADY ALICE WEST, PROVED IN 1395.

In the principal registry of her Majesty's Court of Probate, at Doctors'-commons, there are wills of which "approbation" was "had and obtained" nearly 500 years ago. The first will recorded is in the year 1383, and is in Latin, as most of the very early wills are. The first will written in English is that of Lady Alice West, widow of Sir Thomas West, and was proved on Sept. 1, 1395; it begins thus:—"In dei nomine. Amen. On Thursday—that is to say, the xv day of the moneth of Jul, in the yer of the incarnation of our Lord Ihu Crist a thousand and thre hundred and fourescore and fiftene—I, Alice West, lady of Hynton Martel, in hool estat of my body and in good mynde beyng, make my testament in the maner as hit foloweth hereafter: In the begynnyng, I bequethe my soule to God Almighty and to his moder, Seynt Marie, and to al the seyntis of heuene, and my body to be beryed in Crischurch, in the priorie of the chanones in Hamptshire, by the Newe Forest, wher as myne auncestres leggeth."

The writing of a will of 1395 is not to be read as easily as the writing of the present day, in consequence of the difficulties connected with the different shape of the letters, the variations in and the uncertainty of the spelling, the unfamiliar abbreviations, and the obsolete words; but, from the laborious carefulness with which they were originally engrossed, the pains taken with the formation of each letter, putting to shame the slipshod writing of the present day, and the great care taken of them by the officials who have their custody, they are in a wonderful state of preservation, and far more perfect and legible than many wills and documents of a much later date. The very slowness with which they were written seems to have been the means of rendering them, so far as writing can be made so, permanent. The writing has in many places, where the ink has faded, been since touched up; and in some few places, where the parchment is worn, the words are illegible; but, generally, the writing stands out sharp and distinct, although a little browned by age.

The wills of persons of position were, in spirit, much the same in the fourteenth century as they are now; there are pecuniary and specific legacies to relatives, legacies to old and present servants, legacies for charitable purposes, and particular directions about the funeral and place of burial. Dame Alice West's will is too long to give at length, but some extracts, showing the articles which at that period were so valuable as to be specifically bequeathed, the amounts of the legacies and the persons to whom they were left, may prove interesting.

The lady commences the disposition of her property as follows:—"Also I devyse to Thomas, my sone, a bed of tapicors werk with alle the tapices of sute, red of colour, ypouthered with chapes and scochons in the corners of myn auncestres armes, with that I bequethe to the same Thomas the stoffe longyng therto—that is to seye, my beste fether-bed and a blu canevas and amaters and twey blanketys and a peyreschetes of reynes and sex of my best pilwes," which he will choose.

"Also, I bequethe to the same Thomas, my sone, a peyre matyns book and a peir bedes, and a ryng with which I was yspoused to God, which were my lordes his faderes." Except among small farmers and shopkeepers in Wales, by whom it is a common custom to bequeath bedding to different members of the family, it is an unusual thing in the present day to dispose of it in this manner by will; and the reason is that feather-beds, mattresses, pillows, blankets, and sheets are comparatively cheap, and the use of them not confined to the wealthy; but in Lady Alice's time they must have been articles of luxury and a considerable item in the dower of a bride. There are several bequests of beds in the will which point to this conclusion: in one, 40 marcs are bequeathed to Beatrice Wareyn "and a bed convenient for a gentelwoman;" in another testatrix bequeaths "to Idkyne, my chamber, £20, and a bed convenient for her estat."

Testatrix next thinks of her daughter-in-law. "Also I bequethe to Johane my daughter, my sone is wyf, a masse book and alle the bokes that I have of latyn, english, and frensch out take the forsayd matyns book that is bequeth to Thomas my sone. Also I bequethe to the same Johane all my vestyments of my chapell and my tapices whit and red paled, and blu and red paled, with alle my grene tapices that longeth to my chapell forsayd, and with the frontels of the forsayd auter, and with alle the rydelles and trussing cofres and all other appaare that longeth to my chapelle forsayd." We wonder what books she had, and particularly what English books; a list of them would be most interesting. She could not have had many, and we cannot suggest what they were. It must be remembered that this will was made more than five years before the death of Chaucer, and nearly eighty years before the first book was printed in English, and books in English must consequently have been few indeed; their scarcity made them of great value, they were carefully treasured, and their future ownership specially provided for by will. Something might be said as to the education of ladies of the highest class at that time. Here was a lady possessing books in English, Latin, and French, which it is presumable she could read. Latin, however, was the language of her religion; French was probably the tongue she was brought up in, and was the language of the Court; and English was the language of her dependents, so that, almost as a matter of necessity, every lady of rank must have been familiar with all three languages.

There are several other legacies to testatrix's daughter-in-law, Johane. She gets, among other things, "a basyn of silver, with boses upon the brerdes," and "a chales," we suppose for use in her chapel; and "my chare, and that I have longyng thereto. Also a chariot with twey standares heled with lether, which that serveth for myn barneys." Then come gifts to other members of her family: To "Sir Nichol Clifton, knyght, and to Alianore his wyf, my daughter, and to Thomas Clifton here sone, £120 enenliche to be departed betwix ham thre; and if Thomas here sone forsayd deyeth, I wol that it torne to profet of his fader and his moder;" and to "my suster Dame Luce Fitzherberd, priorisse of Shetebury, £40." The three following legacies speak for themselves: "Also I bequethe £40 to be departed among alle my servants, men and women of myn household, as well for their attendance on Thomas her sone as for her, and as wel to hem that I have eny thyng bequethe to in this testament as to hem that I have nothyng bequethe, and I wole that it be departed trefwely to every man, and woman after his degre." "Also I bequethe £40 to be departed among my pouere tenantes where I have lordshype—that is to seye, to hem that have most nede." "Also I bequethe to Richard Fforster, which is a byndman that was somtyme servant with my forsed lord, 20 marcs."

We should not expect to find any will previously to the Reformation without a legacy to say masses. Lady West gives £18 10s. "for to syngo and seye 4400 masses for my lord Sir Thomas West is soule, and for myne, and for alle cristene soules," and they are to be "done" within "fourteen night after her deces." If it is reckoned up it will be found that masses then cost about a penny each. There is another bequest to Christ Church, where she was to be buried, "to bidde and to rede and syng for my lordes soule forsayd, and myn, and alle cristene soules, whille the world schal laste." Testatrix gives many sums of 100 shillings to bodjes of religious women and communities of
